The Translator's Invisibility

Praise for the first edition:

“Of the many contributions to this field that have appeared over the past two decades, Lawrence Venuti’s new book is surely among the most important.”

Comparative Literature

Since publication over ten years ago, The Translator's Invisibility has provoked debate and controversy within the field of translation and become a classic text. Providing a fascinating account of the history of translation from the seventeenth century to the present day, Venuti shows how fluency prevailed over other translation strategies to shape the canon of foreign literatures in English and investigates the cultural consequences of the domestic values which were simultaneously inscribed and masked in foreign texts during this period. The author locates alternative translation theories and practices in British, American and European cultures which aim to communicate linguistic and cultural differences instead of removing them.

In this new edition of his work, Venuti:

- clarifies and further develops key terms and arguments
- responds to criticisms
- incorporates new case studies that include: an eighteenth-century translation of a French novel by a working-class woman; Richard Burton’s controversial translation of the Arabian Nights; modernist poetry translation; translations of Dostoevsky by the bestselling translators Richard Pevear and Larissa Volokhonsky; and translated crime fiction
- updates data on the current state of translation, including publishing statistics and translators’ rates.

The Translator's Invisibility will be essential reading for students of translation studies at all levels.

Lawrence Venuti is Professor of English at Temple University, Philadelphia. He is a translation theorist and historian as well as a translator and his recent publications include The Scandals of Translation: Towards an Ethics of Difference and The Translation Studies Reader, both published by Routledge.

Preface

The Translator's Invisibility originates in my own work as a professional translator since the late 1970s. But any autobiographical elements are subsumed in what is effectively a history of English-language translation from the seventeenth century to the present. My project is to trace the origins of the situation in which every English-language translator works today, although from an opposing standpoint, with the explicit aim of locating alternatives, of changing that situation. The historical narratives presented here span centuries and national literatures, but even though based on detailed research, they are necessarily selective in articulating key moments and controversies and frankly polemical in studying the past to question the marginal position of translation in contemporary Anglo-American culture. I imagine a diverse audience for the book, including translation theorists, literary theorists and critics, period specialists in various literatures (English-language and foreign), and reviewers of translations for periodicals, publishers, private foundations, and government endowments. Most of all, I wish to speak to translators and readers of translations, both professional and nonprofessional, focusing their attention on the ways that translations are written and read and urging them to think of new ones.

So I wrote in 1994, and in the intervening years my aims have not changed. For the cultural situation in which I formulated them remains substantially the same, regardless of the emergence of translation studies as an area of scholarly research and the mushrooming of translator training programs worldwide. Translation continues to be a largely misunderstood and relatively neglected practice, and the working conditions of translators, whether they translate into English or into other languages, have not undergone any significant transformation. Indeed, in some ways they have worsened.

My audience, however, has taken a different and truly unexpected shape. When I was writing this book in the early 1990s, I did not quite know who might be drawn to its arguments or even to its subject matter. My imagined readership was in effect a utopian projection, a catalogue of the fields, disciplines, and institutions that I felt were necessary to address in order to produce an appreciable change in the current understanding and status of translation. Since I was based in an English Department at a North American university, furthermore, I approached translation from the standpoint of the issues that were then – and still are to a large extent – driving research and debate in literary and cultural studies, notably the idea of original authorship, the relations between language, subjectivity, and ideology, concepts of gender, race, class, and nation as they influence cultural forms and practices, the ethics and politics of cultural representations, the relations between globalization and culture. My effort to consider translation in the context of these issues in fact enabled the book to cross institutional boundaries, to reach readers in a much wider range of fields and disciplines that included but went beyond languages and literatures, stimulating debate and calling attention to the crucial role played by translation in exchanges between cultures. The impact was not only cross-disciplinary, but international, and the data and ideas have informed discussions of translation outside of academia, in the popular media, in government agencies, and in various kinds of cultural institutions, among writers and translators.

Nonetheless, the very data and ideas that made possible this wide circulation also complicated their reception. A reader's particular cultural and institutional site inevitably determined his or her response, and because the readership has been so diverse, not every reader brought to the book the kinds of theoretical assumptions, critical methodologies, and practical experiences that led me to write it in the way that I did. As a result, it has been greeted by productive applications and extensions, incisive criticisms, reductive misunderstandings, and outright attacks, not least in the fledgling field of translation studies, where it has given rise to controversy and provoked scholars to develop critiques that advance their own approaches. These competing approaches have included various forms of linguistics and discourse analysis (see e.g. Baker 2000: 23), "polysystem" theory (Tymoczko 1999 and 2000), and a notion of "interculturality" based on a theory of translation as "negotiation" and "transaction cost" (Pym 1997). Part of my motive for writing the book was the failure of scholars in translation studies to consider the issues that I wanted to raise; given the mixed reception within the field, this state of affairs has not changed as much as I had hoped.

It is primarily the reception of The Translator's Invisibility that has created the need for a second edition. I have taken this opportunity to update statistics and figures and to clarify key terms and arguments. I have also developed some arguments further by presenting new research, particularly on the translation of prose fiction, a genre that received less attention than poetry in the first edition. And throughout I have made revisions that take into account or seek to reply to criticisms.

A project with the broad aims and scope of mine will necessarily come to rely on the help of many people in different fields of literary, critical, and translatorly expertise. Assembling the list of those who read, discussed, criticized, or otherwise encouraged my work on the first edition is a special pleasure, making me realize, once again, how fortunate I was: Antoine Berman, Charles Bernstein, Shelly Brivic, Ann Caesar, Steve Cole, Tim Corrigan, Pellegrino D'Acierno, Guy Davenport, Deirdre David, Milo De Angelis, Rachel Blau DuPlessis, George Economou, Jonathan Galassi, Dana Gioia, Barbara Harlow, Peter Hitchcock, Susan Howe, Suzanne Jill Levine, Philip Lewis, Harry Mathews, Jeremy Maule, Sally Mitchell, Daniel O'Hara, Toby Olson, Douglas Robinson, Stephen Sartarelli, Richard Sieburth, Alan Singer, Nigel Smith, Susan Stewart, Robert Storey, Evelyn Tribble, William Van Wert, Justin Vitiello, William Weaver, Sue Wells, and John Zilcosky. Others assisted me by providing useful and sometimes essential information: Raymond Bentman, Sara Goldin Blackburn, Robert E. Brown, Emile Capouya, Cid Corman, Rob Fitterman, Peter Glassgold, Robert Kelly, Alfred MacAdam, Julie Scott Meisami, M. L. Rosenthal, Susanne Stark, Suzanna Tamminen, Peter Tasch, Maurice Valency, and Eliot Weinberger. For the second edition, I was aided by Peter France, Andrew Grabois, Peter Logan, Christopher MacLehose, Helge Niska, Amanda Seaman, Ebba Segerberg, Stephen Snyder, and Laurie Thompson. Of course none of these people can be held responsible for what I finally made of their contributions.

For opportunities to share this work with various audiences in the United States and abroad, I thank Carrie Asman, Joanna Bankier, Susan Bassnett, Cedric Brown, Craig Eisendrath, Ed Foster, Richard Alan Francis, Seth Frechie and Andrew Mossin, Theo D'haen, Theo Hermans, Paul Hernadi, Robert Holub, Sydney Lévy, Gregory Lucente, Carol Maier, Marie-José Minassian, Anu Needham, Yopie Prins, Marilyn Gaddis Rose, Sherry Simon, William Tropa, and Immanuel Wallerstein.

I am grateful to the staffs of the libraries where much of the research was carried out: the British Library; the Archive for New Poetry, Mandeville Department of Special Collections, University of California, San Diego; Rare Books and Manuscripts, Butler Library, Columbia University; the Library Company, Philadelphia; the Nottingham City Archive; the Inter-Library Loan Department, Paley Library, Temple University; and the Collection of American Literature, Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library, Yale University. I am especially thankful to Bett Miller of the Archive for New Poetry, who did a special job of helping me secure copies of many documents in the Paul Blackburn Collection, and to Adrian Henstock of the Nottingham City Archive, who enabled me to consult Lucy Hutchinson's commonplace book. Philip Cronenwett, Chief of Special Collections at Dartmouth College Library, kindly answered my questions about the Ramon Guthrie papers.

endured the absences necessitated by my work on the second edition and filled my moments away from it with great pleasure. The lines in the dedication, drawn from a poem in César Vallejo's Trilce, record a debt that can never be repaid.

Chapter I

Invisibility

I see translation as the attempt to produce a text so transparent that it does not seem to be translated. A good translation is like a pane of glass. You only notice that it's there when there are little imperfections – scratches, bubbles. Ideally, there shouldn't be any. It should never call attention to itself.

Norman Shapiro

I The regime of fluency

“Invisibility” is the term I will use to describe the translator’s situation and activity in contemporary British and American cultures. It refers to at least two mutually determining phenomena: one is an illusionistic effect of discourse, of the translator’s own manipulation of the translating language, English in this case; the other is the practice of reading and evaluating translations that has long prevailed in the United Kingdom and the United States, among other cultures, both Anglophone and foreign-language. A translated text, whether prose or poetry, fiction or nonfiction, is judged acceptable by most publishers, reviewers and readers when it reads fluently, when the absence of any linguistic or stylistic peculiarities makes it seem transparent, giving the appearance that it reflects the foreign writer’s personality or intention or the essential meaning of the foreign text – the appearance, in other words, that the translation is not in fact a translation, but the “original.” The illusion of transparency is an effect of a fluent translation strategy, of the translator’s effort to insure easy readability by adhering to current usage, maintaining continuous syntax, fixing a precise meaning. But readers also play a significant role in insuring that this illusory effect occurs because of the general tendency to read translations mainly for meaning, to reduce the stylistic features of the translation to the foreign text or writer, and to question any language use that might interfere with the seemingly untroubled communication of the foreign writer’s intention. What is so remarkable here is that the effect of transparency conceals the numerous conditions under which the translation is made, starting with the translator’s crucial intervention. The more fluent the translation, the more invisible the translator, and, presumably, the more visible the writer or meaning of the foreign text.

The dominance of fluency in English-language translation becomes apparent in a sampling of reviews from newspapers and periodicals. On those rare occasions when reviewers address the translation at all, their brief comments usually focus on its style, neglecting such other possible questions as its accuracy, its intended audience, its economic value in the current book market, its relation to literary trends in English, its place in the translator's career. And over the past sixty years the comments have grown amazingly consistent in praising fluency while damning deviations from it, even when the most diverse range of foreign texts is considered.

Take fiction, for instance, the most translated genre worldwide. Limit the choices to European and Latin American writers, the most translated into English, and pick examples with different kinds of narratives – novels and short stories, realistic and fantastic, lyrical and philosophical, psychological and political. Here is one possible list: Albert Camus's The Stranger (1946), Françoise Sagan's Bonjour Tristesse (1955), Heinrich Böll's Absent Without Leave (1965), Italo Calvino's Cosmicomics (1968), Gabriel García Márquez's One Hundred Years of Solitude (1970), Milan Kundera's The Book of Laughter and Forgetting (1980), Mario Vargas Llosa's In Praise of the Stepmother (1990), Gianni Celati's Appearances (1992), Adolfo Bioy Casares's A Russian Doll (1992), Ana Maria Moix's Dangerous Virtues (1997), Michel Houellebecq's The Elementary Particles (2000), Orhan Pamuk's My Name is Red (2001), José Saramago's The Double (2004), and Ismail Kadare's The Successor (2005). Some of these translations enjoyed considerable critical and commercial success in English; others made an initial splash, then sank into oblivion; still others passed with little or no notice. Yet in the reviews they were all judged by the same criterion: fluency. The following selection of excerpts comes from various British and American periodicals, both literary and mass-audience; some were written by noted critics, novelists, and reviewers:

It is not easy, in translating French, to render qualities of sharpness or vividness, but the prose of Mr. Gilbert is always natural, brilliant, and crisp.
(Wilson 1946: 100)

The style is elegant, the prose lovely, and the translation excellent.
(New Republic 1955: 46)

In Absent Without Leave, a novella gracefully if not always flawlessly translated by Leila Vennewitz, Böll continues his stern and sometimes merciless probing of the conscience, values, and imperfections of his countrymen.
(Potoker 1965: 42)

The translation is a pleasantly fluent one: two chapters of it have already appeared in Playboy magazine.
(Times Literary Supplement 1969: 180)

Rabassa's translation is a triumph of fluent, gravid momentum, all stylishness and commonsensical virtuosity.

(West 1970: 4)

His first four books published in English did not speak with the stunning lyrical precision of this one (the invisible translator is Michael Henry Heim).

(Michener 1980: 108)

Helen Lane's translation of the title of this book is faithful to Mario Vargas Llosa's – "Elogio de la Madrastra" – but not quite idiomatic.

(Burgess 1990: 11)

In Stuart Hood's translation, which flows crisply despite its occasional disconcerting British accent, Mr. Celati's keen sense of language is rendered with precision.

(Dickstein 1992: 13)

Often wooden, occasionally careless or inaccurate, it shows all the signs of hurried work and inadequate revision.

(Balderston 1992: 15)

Moix's language, seamlessly translated by Margaret E. W. Jones, invites the reader to teeter on the emotional precipices of the hostess's mental landscape.

(Gaffney 1997: 7)

The translation by Frank Wynne is fluent and natural-sounding, though I notice that Wynne has now and then clouded the clarity of the cranky ideas.

(Berman 2000: 28)

Translated with fluid grace by Erdag M. Goknor, the novel is set in the 16th century.

(Eder 2001: 7)

The novel's translation from the Portuguese by Margaret Jull Costa breezes right along.

(Cobb 2004: 32)

Even in this clunky translation (from the French as opposed to the original Albanian), Kadare stands with Orwell, Kafka, Kundera and Solzhenitsyn as a major chronicler of oppression.

(Publishers Weekly 2005: 43)

The critical lexicon of literary journalism since World War II is filled with so many terms to indicate the presence or absence of a fluent translation strategy: “crisp,” “elegant,” “flows,” “gracefully,” “wooden,” “seamlessly,” “fluid,” “clunky.” There is even a group of pejorative neologisms designed to criticize translations that lack fluency, but also used, more generally, to signify badly written prose: “translatese,” “translationese,” “translatorese.” In English, fluent translation is recommended for an extremely wide range of foreign texts – contemporary and archaic, religious and scientific, fiction and nonfiction.

Translationese in a version from Hebrew is not always easy to detect, since the idioms have been familiarised through the Authorized Version.

(Times Literary Supplement 1961: iv)

An attempt has been made to use modern English which is lively without being slangy. Above all, an effort has been made to avoid the kind of unthinking “translationese” which has so often in the past imparted to translated Russian literature a distinctive, somehow “doughy,” style of its own with little relation to anything present in the original Russian.

(Hingley 1964: x)

He is solemnly reverential and, to give the thing an authentic classical smack, has couched it in the luke-warm translatese of one of his own more unurgent renderings.

(Corke 1967: 761)

There is even a recognizable variant of pidgin English known as “translatorese” (“transjargonisation” being an American term for a particular form of it).

(Times Literary Supplement 1967: 399)

Paralysing woodenness (“I am concerned to determine”), the dull thud of translatese (“Here is the place to mention Pirandello finally”) are often the price we more or less willingly pay for access to great thoughts.

(Brady 1977: 201)

A gathering of such excerpts indicates which discursive features produce fluency in an English-language translation and which do not. A fluent translation is written in English that is current (“modern”) instead of archaic, that is widely used instead of specialized (“jargonisation”), and that is standard instead of colloquial (“slangy”). Foreign words or English words and phrases imprinted by a foreign language (“pidgin”) are avoided, as are Britishisms in American translations and Americanisms in British translations. Fluency also depends on syntax that is not so “faithful” to the foreign text as to be “not quite idiomatic,” that unfolds continuously and easily (“breezes right along” instead of being “doughy”) to insure semantic “precision” with some rhythmic definition, a sense of closure (not a “dull thud”). A fluent translation is immediately recognizable and intelligible, “familiarised,” domesticated, not “disconcerting[ly]” foreign, capable of giving the reader unobstructed “access to great thoughts,” to what is “present in the original.” Under the regime of fluent translating, the translator works to make his or her work “invisible,” producing the illusory effect of transparency that simultaneously masks its status as an illusion: the translated text seems “natural,” that is, not translated.

The dominance of fluency in English-language translation reflects comparable trends in other cultural forms, including other forms of writing. The enormous economic and political power acquired by scientific research during the twentieth century, the post-World War II innovations in advanced communications technologies to expand the advertising and entertainment industries and support the economic cycle of commodity production and exchange – these developments have affected every medium, both print and electronic, by valorizing a purely instrumental use of language and other means of representation and thus emphasizing immediate intelligibility and the appearance of factuality.¹ The American poet Charles Bernstein, who for many years worked as a “commercial writer” of various kinds of nonfiction – medical, scientific, technical – observes how the dominance of fluency in contemporary writing is enforced by its economic value, which sets up acceptable “limits” for deviation:

the fact that the overwhelming majority of steady paid employment for writing involves using the authoritative plain styles, if it is not explicitly advertising; involves writing, that is, filled with preclusions, is a measure of why this is not simply a matter of stylistic choice but of social governance: we are not free to choose the language of the workplace or of the family we are born into, though we are free, within limits, to rebel against it.

The authority of “plain styles” in English-language writing was of course achieved over several centuries, what Bernstein describes as “the historical movement toward uniform spelling and grammar, with an ideology that emphasizes nonidiosyncratic, smooth transition, elimination of awkwardness, &c. – anything that might concentrate attention on the language itself” (ibid.: 27). In contemporary British and American literatures, this movement has made realism the most prevalent form of narrative and free, prose-like verse the most prevalent form of poetry:

in contrast to, say, Sterne’s work, where the look & texture – the opacity – of the text is everywhere present, a neutral transparent prose style has developed in certain novels where the words seem meant to be looked through – to the depicted world beyond the page. Likewise, in current middle of the road poetry, we see the elimination of overt rhyme & alliteration, with metric forms retained primarily for their capacity to officialize as “poetry.”

(Ibid.)²

In view of these cultural trends, it seems inevitable that fluency would become the authoritative strategy for translating, whether the foreign text was literary or scientific/technical, humanistic or pragmatic, a novel or a restaurant menu. The British translator J. M. Cohen noticed this development as early as 1962, when he remarked that “twentieth-century translators, influenced by science-teaching and the growing importance attached to accuracy [...] have generally concentrated on prose-meaning and interpretation, and neglected the imitation of form and manner” (Cohen 1962: 35). Cohen also noticed the domestication involved here, “the risk of reducing individual authors’ styles and national tricks of speech to a plain prose uniformity,” but he felt that this “danger” was avoided by the “best” translations (ibid.: 33). What he failed to see, however, was that the criterion for determining the “best” was still radically English. Translating for “prose-meaning and interpretation,” practicing translation as simple communication, rewrites the foreign text according to such English-language values as fluency and the accompanying effect of transparency, but entirely eclipses the translator’s domesticating work – even in the eyes of the translator.

The translator’s invisibility is also partly determined by the individualistic conception of authorship that continues to prevail in British and American cultures. According to this conception, the author freely expresses his thoughts and feelings in writing, which is thus viewed as an original and transparent self-representation, unmediated by transindividual determinants (linguistic, cultural, social) that might complicate authorial originality. This view of authorship carries two disadvantageous implications for the translator. On the one hand, translation is defined as a second-order representation: only the foreign text can be original, an authentic copy, true to the author’s personality or intention, whereas the translation is derivative, fake, potentially a false copy. On the other hand, translation is required to efface its second-order status with the effect of transparency, producing the illusion of authorial presence whereby the translated text can be taken as the original. To point out these implications is not to argue that the translator should be seen as comparable to the foreign author: translations are different in intention and effect from original compositions, and this generic distinction is worth preserving as a means of describing different sorts of writing practices. The point is rather that the precise nature of the translator’s authorship remains unformulated, and so the notion of authorial originality continues to stigmatize the translator’s work (see Venuti 1998: chap. 2).

However much the individualistic conception of authorship devalues translation among publishers, reviewers, and readers, it is so pervasive that it also shapes translators’ self-presentations, leading some to psychologize their relationship to the foreign text as a process of identification with the author. The American Willard Trask (1900–80), a major twentieth-century translator in terms of the quantity and cultural importance of his work, drew a clear distinction between authoring and translating. When asked in a late interview whether “the impulse” to translate “is the same as that of someone who wants to write a novel” (a question that is clearly individualistic in its reference to an authorial “impulse”), Trask replied:

No, I wouldn't say so, because I once tried to write a novel. When you're writing a novel [...] you're obviously writing about people or places, something or other, but what you are essentially doing is expressing yourself. Whereas when you translate you're not expressing yourself. You're performing a technical stunt. [...] I realized that the translator and the actor had to have the same kind of talent. What they both do is to take something of somebody else's and put it over as if it were their own. I think you have to have that capacity. So in addition to the technical stunt, there is a psychological workout, which translation involves: something like being on stage. It does something entirely different from what I think of as creative poetry writing.

(Honig 1985: 13–14)

In Trask's analogy, translators playact as authors, and translations pass for original texts. Some translators are aware that any sense of authorial presence in a translation is an illusion, an effect of transparent discourse, comparable to a "stunt," but they nonetheless assert that they participate in a "psychological" relationship with the author in which they repress their own "personality." "I guess I consider myself in a kind of collaboration with the author," says American translator Norman Shapiro; "Certainly my ego and personality are involved in translating, and yet I have to try to stay faithful to the basic text in such a way that my own personality doesn't show" (Kratz 1986: 27).

The translator's invisibility is thus a weird self-annihilation, a way of conceiving and practicing translation that undoubtedly reinforces its marginal status in British and American cultures. For although the past fifty years have seen the institution of translation centers and translator training programs at British and American universities, as well as the founding of translation committees, associations, and awards in literary organizations like the Society of Authors in London and the PEN American Center in New York, the fact remains that translators receive minimal recognition for their work – including translators of writing that is capable of generating publicity because it is bestselling, prize-winning, controversial, censored. The typical mention of the translator in a review takes the form of a brief aside in which, more often than not, the fluency or transparency of the translation is gauged.

This, however, is an infrequent occurrence. Ronald Christ has described the prevailing practice: "many newspapers, such as The Los Angeles Times, do not even list the translators in headnotes to reviews, reviewers often fail to mention that a book is a translation (while quoting from the text as though it were written in English), and publishers almost uniformly exclude translators from book covers and advertisements" (Christ 1984: 8). A particularly egregious example of this exclusion occurred in 2001 with Richard Pevear and Larissa Volokhonsky's version of Tolstoy's Anna Karenina: Penguin Classics ran an ad that quoted from reviews praising the translation for its transparency (Allan Massie in the Scotsman: "It reads so naturally that you forget it is a translation"), but nowhere were the translators named (Times Literary Supplement 21 Dec. 2001: 7). Even when the reviewer is also a writer, a novelist, say, or a poet, the fact that the text under review is a translation may be overlooked. In 1981 the American novelist John Updike reviewed two foreign novels for The New Yorker, Italo Calvino's If On a Winter's Night a Traveller and Günter Grass's The Meeting at Telgte, but the lengthy essay made only the barest reference to the translators. Their names appeared in parentheses after the first mention of the English-language titles. Reviewers who may be expected to have a writerly sense of language are seldom inclined to discuss translation as writing.

The translator's shadowy existence in British and American cultures is further registered, and maintained, in the ambiguous and unfavorable legal status of translation, both in copyright law and in actual contractual arrangements. British and American law defines translation as an "adaptation" or "derivative work" based on an "original work of authorship," whose copyright, including the exclusive right "to prepare derivative works" or "adaptations," is vested in the "author."³ The translator is thus subordinated to the author, who decisively controls the publication of the translation during the term of the copyright for the "original" text, currently the author's lifetime plus seventy years. Yet since authorship here is defined as the creation of a form or medium of expression, not an idea, as originality of language, not thought, British and American law permits translations to be copyrighted in the translator's name, recognizing that the translator uses another language for the foreign text and therefore can be understood as creating an original work (Skone James et al. 1991; Stracher 1991). In copyright law, the translator is and is not an author.⁴

The translator's authorship is never given full legal recognition because of the priority given to the foreign writer in controlling the translation – even to point of compromising the translator's rights as a British or American citizen. In subscribing to international copyright treaties like the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works, the United Kingdom and the United States agree to treat nationals of other member countries like their own nationals for purposes of copyright (Scarles 1980: 8–11). Hence British and American law holds that an English-language translation of a foreign text can be published only by arrangement with the author who owns the copyright for that text – that is, the foreign writer, or, as the case may be, a foreign agent or publisher. The translator may be allowed the authorial privilege to copyright the translation, but he or she is excluded from the legal protection that authors enjoy as citizens of the UK or US in deference to another author, a foreign national. The ambiguous legal definition of translation, both original and derivative, exposes a limitation in the translator's citizenship, as well as the inability of current copyright law to think translation across national boundaries despite the existence of international treaties. The Berne Convention (Paris, 1971) at once assigns an authorial right to the translator and withdraws it: "Translations, adaptations, arrangements of music and other alterations of a literary or artistic work shall be protected as original works without prejudice to the copyright in the original work" held by the foreign "author," who "shall enjoy the exclusive right of making and of authorising the translation” (articles 2(3), 8).⁵ Copyright law does not define a space for the translator’s authorship that is equal to, or in any way restricts, the foreign author’s rights. And yet it acknowledges that there is a material basis to warrant some such restriction.

Translation contracts since World War II have in fact varied widely, partly because of the ambiguities in copyright law, but also because of other factors like changing book markets, a particular translator’s level of expertise, and the difficulty of a particular translation project. Nonetheless, general trends can be detected over the course of several decades, and they reveal publishers excluding the translator from any rights in the translation. Standard British contracts require the translator to make an out-and-out assignment of the copyright to the publisher. In the United States, the most common contractual definition of the translated text has not been “original work of authorship,” but “work made for hire,” a category in American copyright law whereby “the employer or person for whom the work was prepared is considered the author [...] and, unless the parties have expressly agreed otherwise in a written instrument signed by them, owns all the rights comprised in the copyright” (17 US Code, sections 101, 201[6]). Work-for-hire contracts alienate the translator from the product of his or her labor with remarkable finality. Here is the relevant clause in Columbia University Press’s standard contract for translators:

You and we agree that the work you will prepare has been specially ordered and commissioned by us, and is a work made for hire as such term is used and defined by the Copyright Act. Accordingly, we shall be considered the sole and exclusive owner throughout the world forever of all rights existing therein, free of claims by you or anyone claiming through you or on your behalf.

This work-for-hire contract embodies the ambiguity of the translator’s legal status by including another, equally standard clause that implicitly recognizes the translator as an author, the creator of an “original” work: “You warrant that your work will be original and that it will not infringe upon the copyright or violate any right of any person or party whatsoever.”

Contracts that require translators to assign the copyright, or that define translations as works made for hire, are exploitative in the division of earnings. Such translations are compensated by a flat fee per thousand words of the translating language, regardless of the potential income from the sale of books and subsidiary rights (e.g. a periodical publication, a license to a paperback publisher, an option by a film production company). An actual case will make clear how this arrangement exploits translators. On 12 May 1965 the American translator Paul Blackburn entered into a work-for-hire arrangement with Pantheon in which he received “$15.00 per thousand words” for his translation of End of the Game, a collection of short stories by the Argentine writer Julio Cortázar.⁶ Blackburn received a total of $1200 for producing an English-language translation that filled 277 pages as a printed book; Cortázar received a $2000 advance against royalties, 7.5 percent of the list price for the first 5000 copies. The “poverty level” set by the Federal government in 1965 was an annual income of $1894 (for a male). Blackburn’s income as an editor was usually $8000, but to complete the translation he was forced to reduce his editorial work and seek a grant from arts agencies and private foundations which he failed to receive. Ultimately, he requested an extension of the delivery date for the translation from roughly a year to sixteen months (the contracted date of 1 June 1966 was later changed to 1 October 1966). His translation, meanwhile, has been continuously in print since 1967, earning royalties for Cortázar’s estate (he died in 1984) and a profit for Pantheon which to call “handsome” would no doubt be a gross understatement.

Blackburn’s difficult situation has been faced by most freelance English-language translators throughout the twentieth century: below-subsistence fees force them either to translate sporadically, while working at other jobs (typically editing, writing, teaching), or to undertake multiple translation projects simultaneously, the number of which is determined by the book market and sheer physical limitations. By 1969, the fee for work-for-hire translations increased to $20 per thousand words, making Blackburn’s Cortázar project worth $1600, while the poverty level was set at $1974; by 1979, the going rate was $30 and Blackburn would have made $2400, while the poverty level was $3689.⁷ According to a 1990 survey conducted by the PEN American Center and limited to the responses of nineteen publishers, 75 percent of the translations surveyed were contracted on a work-for-hire basis, with fees ranging from $40 to $90 per thousand words (Keeley 1990: 10–12; A Handbook for Literary Translators 1991: 5–6). An estimate made in the same year put the translation cost of a 300-page novel between $3000 and $6000 (Marcus 1990: 13–14; cf. Gardam 1990). The poverty level in 1989 was set at $5936 for a person under 65 years. In 2004 Jeremy Munday and I circulated a questionnaire to which approximately 60 English-language translators responded with details regarding their fees. Although hardly representative, the sample suggests that the average rate had climbed to $100 per thousand words, bringing the translation cost of a 300-page novel to roughly $9000. The poverty level in 2004 was set at $9310 for a single person. Because this economic situation drives freelance translators to turn out translations as quickly as humanly possible, it inevitably limits the literary invention and critical reflection applied to a project, while pitting translators against each other – often unwittingly – in the competition for projects and the negotiation of fees.

Contracts since the 1980s show an increasing recognition of the translator’s crucial role in the production of the translation by referring to him or her as the “author” or “translator” and by copyrighting the text in the translator’s name. This redefinition has been accompanied by an improvement in financial terms, with experienced translators receiving an advance against royalties, usually a percentage of the list price or the net proceeds, as well as a portion of subsidiary rights sales. The 1990 PEN survey indicated that translators’ royalties were “in the area of 2 to 5 percent for hardcover and 1.5 to 2.5 percent for paperback,” and for some translators these rates have continued into the twenty-first century (Handbook 1991: 5). But such increments are clearly small. While they signal a growing awareness of the translator's authorship, they do not constitute a significant change in the economics of translation, and it remains difficult for a freelance translator to make a living solely from translating. A typical first printing for a literary translation published by a trade press is approximately 5000 copies (less for a university press), so that even with the trend towards contracts offering royalties, the translator is unlikely to see any income beyond the advance. Very few translations become bestsellers; very few are likely to be reprinted, whether in hardcover or paperback. And, perhaps most importantly, very few translations are published in English.

British and American book production has increased more than tenfold since the 1950s, but the number of translations has remained roughly between 2 and 4 percent of total annual output – notwithstanding a marked surge during the early 1960s, when the number of translations ranged between 4 and 7 percent of the total.⁸ Over the past decade the figures have edged even lower. In 1995, according to industry statistics, American publishers brought out 113,589 books, of which 3252 were translations (2.85 percent), while in 2004 a total of 195,000 books included 4040 translations (2.07 percent). In 2001 British publishers brought out 119,001 books, of which 1668 were translations (1.4 percent).

Publishing practices in other countries have generally run in the opposite direction. Western European publishing has also burgeoned over the past several decades, but translations have always amounted to a significant percentage of total book production, and this percentage has consistently been dominated by translations from English. The translation rate in France has varied between 8 and 12 percent of the total. In 1985 French publishers brought out 29,068 books, of which 2867 were translations (9.9 percent), 2051 from English (Frémy 1992). The translation rate in Italy has been higher. In 1989 Italian publishers brought out 33,893 books, of which 8602 were translations (25.4 percent), while in 2002 a total of 54,624 Italian books included 12,531 translations (22.9 percent); in both years more than half the translations were from English (Lottman 1991: S5; Publishers Weekly Daily 2005). The German publishing industry is somewhat larger than its European counterparts, and here too the translation rate is considerably higher. In 1990 German publishers brought out 61,015 books, of which 8716 were translations (14.4 percent), including about 5650 from English (Flad 1992: 40). In 2004 the number of new titles in Germany rose to 74,074, of which 5,406 were translations (7.3 percent), more than half from English (Emmerling 2006). Since World War II, English has been the most translated language worldwide, but it isn't much translated into, given the number of English-language books published annually. In 2000, according to UNESCO statistics, 43,011 books were translated from English throughout the world, followed by 6670 from French, 6204 from German, 2432 from Italian, and 1973 from Spanish.

These translation patterns point to a trade imbalance with serious cultural ramifications. British and American publishers travel every year to international markets like the Frankfurt Book Fair, where they sell translation rights for many English-language books, including the global bestsellers, but rarely buy the rights to publish English-language translations of foreign books. These publishers have devoted more attention to acquiring bestsellers, and the formation of multinational publishing conglomerates has brought more capital to support this editorial policy (an advance for a predicted bestseller is now in the millions of dollars) while limiting the number of financially risky books, like translations (Whiteside 1981; Feldman 1986; Schiffrin 2000). The London literary agent Paul Marsh confirms this trend by urging publishers to concentrate on selling translation rights instead of buying them: “any book with four or five translation sales in the bag at an early stage stands a good chance of at least nine or 10 by the end of the process” (Marsh 1991: 27). Marsh adds that “most translation rights deals are done for a modest return,” but the fact is that British and American publishers routinely receive lucrative advances for these deals, even when a foreign publisher or agent pressures them to consider other kinds of income (viz. royalties). The Milan-based Antonella Antonelli is one such agent, although the figure she once cited as an imprudent Italian investment in an English-language book – “If you pay a $200,000 advance, you can’t make it back in Italy” – actually suggests how profitable translation rights can be for the publishers involved, foreign as well as British and American (Lottman 1991: S6). In 2000 French translations of American bestsellers by authors like Danielle Steele and Patricia Cornwell were selling over 200,000 copies on publication (Publishers Weekly 2000).

The consequences of this trade imbalance are diverse and far-reaching. By routinely translating large numbers of the most varied English-language books, foreign publishers have exploited the global drift towards American political and economic hegemony since World War II, actively supporting the international expansion of British and American cultures. British and American publishers, in turn, have reaped the financial benefits of successfully imposing English-language cultural values on a vast foreign readership, while producing cultures in the United Kingdom and the United States that are aggressively monolingual, unreceptive to foreign literatures, accustomed to fluent translations that invisibly inscribe foreign texts with British and American values and provide readers with the narcissistic experience of recognizing their own culture in a cultural other. The prevalence of fluent domestication has supported these developments because of its economic value: enforced by editors, publishers and reviewers, fluency results in translations that are eminently readable and therefore consumable on the book market, assisting in their commodification and insuring the neglect of foreign texts and English-language translation strategies that are more resistant to easy readability.

The translator’s invisibility can now be seen as a mystification of troubling proportions, an amazingly successful concealment of the multiple determinants and effects of English-language translation, the multiple hierarchies and exclusions in which it is implicated. An illusionism fostered by fluent translating, the translator’s invisibility at once enacts and masks an insidious domestication of foreign texts, rewriting them in the transparent discourse that prevails in English and that selects precisely those foreign texts amenable to fluent translating. Insofar as the effect of transparency effaces the work of translation, it contributes to the cultural marginality and economic exploitation that English-language translators have long suffered, their status as seldom recognized, poorly paid writers whose work nonetheless remains indispensable because of the global domination of British and American cultures, of English. Behind the translator's invisibility is a trade imbalance that underwrites this domination, but also decreases the cultural capital of foreign values in English by limiting the number of foreign texts translated and submitting them to domesticating revision. The translator's invisibility is symptomatic of a complacency in British and American relations with cultural others, a complacency that can be described – without too much exaggeration – as imperialistic abroad and xenophobic at home.

The concept of the translator's "invisibility" is already a cultural critique, a diagnosis that opposes the situation it represents. It is partly a representation from below, from the standpoint of the contemporary English-language translator, although one who has been driven to question the conditions of his work because of various developments, cultural and social, foreign and domestic. The motive of this book is to make the translator more visible so as to resist and change the conditions under which translation is theorized, studied, and practiced today, especially in English-speaking countries. Hence the first step will be to present a theoretical basis from which translations can be read as translations, as texts in their own right, permitting transparency to be demystified, seen as one discursive effect among others.

2 The violence of translation

Translation is a process by which the chain of signifiers that constitutes the foreign text is replaced by a chain of signifiers in the translating language which the translator provides on the strength of an interpretation. Because meaning is an effect of relations and differences among signifiers along a potentially endless chain (polysemous, intertextual, subject to infinite linkages), it is always differential and deferred, never present as an original unity (Derrida 1982). Both foreign text and translation are derivative: both consist of diverse linguistic and cultural materials that neither the foreign writer nor the translator originates, and that destabilize the work of signification, inevitably exceeding and possibly conflicting with their intentions. As a result, a foreign text is the site of many different semantic possibilities that are fixed only provisionally in any one translation, on the basis of varying cultural assumptions and interpretive choices, in specific social situations, in different historical periods. Meaning is a plural and contingent relation, not an unchanging unified essence, and therefore a translation cannot be judged according to mathematics-based concepts of semantic equivalence or one-to-one correspondence. Appeals to the foreign text cannot finally adjudicate between competing translations in the absence of linguistic error, because canons of accuracy in translation, notions of “fidelity” and “freedom,” are historically determined categories. Even the notion of “linguistic error” is subject to variation, since mistranslations, especially in literary texts, can be not merely intelligible but significant in the receiving culture. The viability of a translation is established by its relationship to the cultural and social conditions under which it is produced and read.

This relationship points to the violence that resides in the very purpose and activity of translation: the reconstitution of the foreign text in accordance with values, beliefs, and representations that preexist it in the translating language and culture, always configured in hierarchies of dominance and marginality, always determining the production, circulation, and reception of texts (cf. the notion of “norms” in Toury 1995: 53–69). My use of the term “violence” here has been questioned by a professional translator who works between such dissimilar languages as Hebrew and English (Green 2001: 85). Yet if by this term we mean “damage” or “abuse,” then my use of it is neither exaggerated nor metaphoric, but precisely descriptive: a translator is forced not only to eliminate aspects of the signifying chain that constitutes the foreign text, starting with its graphematic and acoustic features, but also to dismantle and disarrange that chain in accordance with the structural differences between languages, so that both the foreign text and its relations to other texts in the foreign culture never remain intact after the translation process. Translation is the forcible replacement of the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text with a text that is intelligible to the translating-language reader. These differences can never be entirely removed, but they necessarily undergo a reduction and exclusion of possibilities – and an exorbitant gain of other possibilities specific to the translating language. Whatever difference the translation conveys is now imprinted by the receiving culture, assimilated to its positions of intelligibility, its canons and taboos, its codes and ideologies. The aim of translation is to bring back a cultural other as the recognizable, the familiar, even the same; and this aim always risks a wholesale domestication of the foreign text, often in highly self-conscious projects where translation serves an appropriation of foreign cultures for agendas in the receiving situation, cultural, economic, political. Translation is not an untroubled communication of a foreign text, but an interpretation that is always limited by its address to specific audiences and by the cultural or institutional situations where the translated text is intended to circulate and function.

The violent effects of translation are felt at home as well as abroad. On the one hand, translation wields enormous power in the construction of identities for foreign cultures, and hence it potentially figures in ethnic discrimination, geopolitical confrontations, colonialism, terrorism, war (see Rafael 1988; Fenton and Moon 2002; Mason 2004; Baker 2006). On the other hand, translation enlists the foreign text in the maintenance or revision of literary canons in the receiving culture, inscribing poetry and fiction, for example, with the various poetic, narrative, and ideological discourses that compete for cultural dominance in the translating language (see Lefevere 1992a; Lyne 2001; Damrosch 2003).

Translation also enlists the foreign text in the maintenance or revision of dominant conceptual paradigms, research methodologies and clinical practices that inform disciplines and professions in the receiving culture, whether physics or architecture, philosophy or psychiatry, sociology or law (see Ornston 1992; Montgomery 2000; Lotringer and Cohen 2001). It is these social affiliations and effects – written into the materiality of the translated text, into its discursive strategy and its range of allusiveness for the translating-language reader, but also into the very choice to translate it and the ways it is published, reviewed, and taught – all these conditions permit translation to be called a cultural political practice, constructing or critiquing ideology-stamped identities for foreign cultures, affirming or transgressing discursive values and institutional limits in the receiving culture. The violence wreaked by translation is partly inevitable, inherent in the translation process, partly potential, emerging at any point in the production and reception of the translated text, varying with specific cultural and social formations at different historical moments.

The most urgent question facing the translator who possesses this knowledge is: What to do? Why and how do I translate? Although I have construed translation as the site of many determinations and effects – linguistic, cultural, economic, ideological – I also want to indicate that the freelance literary translator always exercises a choice concerning the degree and direction of the violence at work in any translating. This choice has been given various formulations, past and present, but perhaps none so decisive as that offered by the German theologian and philosopher Friedrich Schleiermacher. In an 1813 lecture on the different “methods” of translation, Schleiermacher argued that “there are only two. Either the translator leaves the author in peace as much as possible and moves the reader towards him; or he leaves the reader in peace, as much as possible, and moves the author towards him” (Lefevere 1977: 74). Admitting (with qualifications like “as much as possible”) that translation can never be completely adequate to the foreign text, Schleiermacher allowed the translator to choose between a domesticating practice, an ethnocentric reduction of the foreign text to receiving cultural values, bringing the author back home, and a foreignizing practice, an ethnodeviant pressure on those values to register the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text, sending the reader abroad.

Schleiermacher made clear that his choice was foreignizing translation, and this led the French translator and translation theorist Antoine Berman to treat Schleiermacher’s argument as an ethics of translation, concerned with making the translated text a place where a cultural other is manifested – although, of course, an otherness that can never be manifested in its own terms, only in those of the translating language, and hence always already encoded (Berman 1985: 87–91).⁹ The “foreign” in foreignizing translation is not a transparent representation of an essence that resides in the foreign text and is valuable in itself, but a strategic construction whose value is contingent on the current situation in the receiving culture. Foreignizing translation signifies the differences of the foreign text, yet only by disrupting the cultural codes that prevail in the translating language. In its effort to do right abroad, this translation practice must do wrong at home, deviating enough from native norms to stage an alien reading experience – choosing to translate a foreign text excluded by literary canons in the receiving culture, for instance, or using a marginal discourse to translate it.

I want to suggest that insofar as foreignizing translation seeks to restrain the ethnocentric violence of translation, it is highly desirable today, a strategic cultural intervention in the current state of world affairs, pitched against the hegemonic English-language nations and the unequal cultural exchanges in which they engage their global others. Foreignizing translation in English can be a form of resistance against ethnocentrism and racism, cultural narcissism and imperialism, in the interests of democratic geopolitical relations. As a theory and practice of translation, foreignizing is specific to certain European countries at particular historical moments: formulated first in German culture during the classical and romantic periods, it was revived in a French cultural scene characterized by postmodern developments in philosophy, literary criticism, psychoanalysis, and social theory that have come to be known as poststructuralism.¹⁰ British and American cultures, in contrast, have long been dominated by domesticating theories that recommend fluent translating. By producing the illusion of transparency, a fluent translation masquerades as a true semantic equivalence when it in fact inscribes the foreign text with a partial interpretation, partial to English-language values, reducing if not simply excluding the very differences that translation is called on to convey. This ethnocentric violence is evident in the translation theories put forth by the prolific and influential Eugene Nida, translation consultant to the American Bible Society: here transparency is enlisted in the service of Christian humanism.

Consider Nida's concept of "dynamic" or "functional equivalence," formulated first in 1964 but restated and developed in various publications since then. "A translation of dynamic equivalence aims at complete naturalness of expression," states Nida, "and tries to relate the receptor to modes of behavior relevant within the context of his own culture" (Nida 1964: 159). The phrase "naturalness of expression" signals the importance of a fluent strategy to this theory of translation, and in Nida's work it is obvious that fluency involves domestication. As he has put it, "the translator must be a person who can draw aside the curtains of linguistic and cultural differences so that people may see clearly the relevance of the original message" (Nida and de Waard 1986: 14). This is of course a relevance to the receiving culture, something with which foreign writers are usually not concerned when they write their texts, so that relevance can be established in the translation process only by replacing foreign-language features that are not recognizable with translating-language ones that are. Thus, when Nida asserts that "an easy and natural style in translating, despite the extreme difficulty of producing it [...] is nevertheless essential to producing in the ultimate receptors a response similar to that of the original receptors" (Nida 1964: 163), he is in fact imposing the English-language valorization of transparency on every foreign culture, masking a basic disjunction between the foreign and translated texts which puts into question the possibility of eliciting a "similar" response.

Typical of other theorists in the British and American translation traditions, however, Nida has argued that dynamic equivalence is consistent with a notion of accuracy. The dynamically equivalent translation does not randomly use “anything which might have special impact and appeal for receptors”; it rather “means thoroughly understanding not only the meaning of the source text but also the manner in which the intended receptors of a text are likely to understand it in the receptor language” (Nida and de Waard 1986: vii–viii, 9). For Nida, accuracy in translation depends on generating an equivalent effect in the receiving culture: “the receptors of a translation should comprehend the translated text to such an extent that they can understand how the original receptors must have understood the original text” (ibid.: 36). The dynamically equivalent translation is “interlingual communication” which overcomes the linguistic and cultural differences that impede it (ibid.: 11). Yet the understanding of the foreign text and culture which this kind of translation makes possible answers fundamentally to receiving cultural values while veiling this domestication in the transparency evoked by a fluent strategy. Communication here is controlled by or for the receptors, it is in fact an interested interpretation, and therefore it seems less an exchange of information than an appropriation of a foreign text to serve a purpose in the receiving culture. Nida’s theory of translation as communication does not adequately take into account the ethnocentric violence that is inherent in every translation process – but especially in one governed by dynamic equivalence. In view of this violence, how can a translation possibly produce an effect on its receptors that is equivalent to the effect produced by the foreign text on its initial audience?

Nida’s advocacy of domesticating translation is explicitly grounded on a transcendental concept of humanity as an essence that remains unchanged over time and space. “As linguists and anthropologists have discovered,” Nida states, “that which unites mankind is much greater than that which divides, and hence there is, even in cases of very disparate languages and cultures, a basis for communication” (Nida 1964: 2). Nida’s humanism may appear to be democratic in its appeal to “that which unites mankind,” but this is contradicted by the more exclusionary values that inform his theory of translation, specifically Christian evangelism and cultural elitism.

From the very beginning of his career, Nida’s work has been motivated by the exigencies of Bible translation. Not only have problems in the history of Bible translation served as examples for his theoretical statements, but he has written studies in anthropology and linguistics designed primarily for Bible translators and missionaries. Nida’s concept of dynamic equivalence in fact links the translator to the missionary. When in Customs and Cultures: Anthropology for Christian Missions (1954) he asserted that “a close examination of successful missionary work inevitably reveals the correspondingly effective manner in which the missionaries were able to identify themselves with the people – ‘to be all things to all men’ – and to communicate their message in terms which have meaning for the lives of the people” (Nida 1975: 250), he was echoing what he had earlier asserted of the Bible translator in God's Word in Man's Language (1952): "The task of the true translator is one of identification. As a Christian servant he must identify with Christ; as a translator he must identify himself with the Word; as a missionary he must identify himself with the people" (Nida 1952: 117). Both the missionary and the translator must find the dynamic equivalent in the translating language so as to establish the relevance of the Bible in the receiving culture.

Yet Nida permits only a particular kind of relevance to be established. While he disapproves of "the tendency to promote by means of Bible translating the cause of a particular theological viewpoint, whether deistic, rationalistic, immersionistic, millenarian, or charismatic" (Nida and de Waard 1986: 33), it is obvious that he himself has promoted a reception of the text centered in Christian dogma. And although he offers a nuanced account of how "diversities in the backgrounds of receptors" can shape any Bible translation, he insists that "translations prepared primarily for minority groups must generally involve highly restrictive forms of language, but they must not involve substandard grammar or vulgar wording" (ibid.: 14). Nida's concept of dynamic equivalence in Bible translation goes hand in hand with an evangelical zeal that seeks to impose on English-language readers a specific dialect of English, current standard usage, as well as a distinctly Christian understanding of the Bible. When Nida's translator identifies with the translating-language reader to communicate the foreign text, he simultaneously excludes other constituencies in the receiving culture.

To advocate foreignizing translation in opposition to British and American traditions of domestication is not to do away with cultural political agendas – such an advocacy is itself an agenda. The aim is rather to develop a theory and practice of translation that resists dominant values in the receiving culture so as to signify the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text. Philip Lewis's concept of "abusive fidelity" can be useful in such a theorization: it acknowledges the abusive, equivocal relationship between the translation and the foreign text and eschews the prevailing fluent strategy in order to imitate in the translation whatever features of the foreign text abuse or resist dominant cultural values in the foreign language. Abusive fidelity directs the translator's attention away from the conceptual signified to the play of signifiers on which it depends, to phonological, syntactical, and discursive structures, resulting in a "translation that values experimentation, tampers with usage, seeks to match the polyvalencies or plurivocities or expressive stresses of the original by producing its own" (Lewis 1985: 41). Schleiermacher had recommended only close adherence to the foreign text to evoke a sense of foreignness in the translation. With Lewis, however, we can glimpse the possibility of an experimentalism in which the translator works with various aspects of the translating language, not only lexicon and syntax, but registers and dialects, styles and discourses. The resulting strategy might be called resistancy, not merely because it tries to avoid the narrow kinds of fluency that have long dominated English-language translation, but because it challenges the receiving culture even as it enacts its own ethnocentric violence on the foreign text.

In developing such a strategy, however, fluency is not to be simply abandoned, completely and irrevocably, but rather reinvented in innovative ways. The foreignizing translator seeks to expand the range of translation practices not to frustrate or to impede reading, certainly not to incur a judgment of translationese, but to create new conditions of readability. For the fact is that what constitutes fluent translating changes from one historical moment to another and from one cultural constituency to another, so that a translation that an eighteenth-century reader found easily readable is unlikely to be so for most readers today (see Venuti 2005a: 804–6). It is precisely fluency as now practiced and enforced, restricted primarily to the current standard dialect of the translating language, that has mystified translation and limited the creativity of translators, demanding both an interrogation and a rethinking to advance translation research and practice.

Experimenting with fluency so as to write a foreignizing translation still requires the translator to draw on the resources of the translating language and culture and is therefore implicated in the ethnocentrism that lies at the very heart of translation. Despite the claims of my critics, therefore, the terms “domestication” and “foreignization” do not establish a neat binary opposition that can simply be superimposed on “fluent” or “resistant” discursive strategies, nor can these two sets of terms be reduced to the true binaries that have proliferated in the history of translation commentary, such as “literal” vs. “free,” “formal” vs. “dynamic,” and “semantic” vs. “communicative” (Pym 1995: 7; Tymoczko 1999: 56). The terms “domestication” and “foreignization” indicate fundamentally ethical attitudes towards a foreign text and culture, ethical effects produced by the choice of a text for translation and by the strategy devised to translate it, whereas terms like “fluency” and “resistancy” indicate fundamentally discursive features of translation strategies in relation to the reader’s cognitive processing. Both sets of terms demarcate a spectrum of textual and cultural effects that depend for their description and evaluation on the relation between a translation project and the hierarchical arrangement of values in the receiving situation at a particular historical moment. Those values must always be reconstructed, whether by the translator or by the translation scholar, and the reconstruction must start with patterns of linguistic usage, literary and cultural traditions, and translation practices that have become traditional or conventional because of repeated and widespread use over time. Any significance assigned to the terms “domestication” and “foreignization” or “fluency” and “resistancy,” any application of them to a specific translation project, must be treated as culturally variable and historically contingent, dependent on acts of interpretation that are informed by archival research and textual analyses and, like every interpretation, are subject to challenge and revision on the basis of different critical methodologies and in response to developing cultural debates.

Although my main concern here is British and American translation traditions, the concept of foreignizing can be productively applied to translating in any language and culture. Foreignization does not offer unmediated access to the foreign – no translation can do that – but rather constructs a certain image of the foreign that is informed by the receiving situation but aims to question it by drawing on materials that are not currently dominant, namely the marginal and the nonstandard, the residual and the emergent. Insofar as translation enacts two simultaneous processes of identity formation, constructing both images for foreign cultures and positions of intelligibility for receiving subjects, foreignizing translation can be doubly interrogative (see Venuti 1998: chap. 4; for an incisive treatment of current issues and debates, see Cronin 2006). No culture should be considered immune to self-criticism, whether hegemonic or subordinate, colonizer or colonized. And without such practices as foreignizing translation to test its limits a culture can lapse into an exclusionary or narcissistic complacency and become a fertile ground for ideological developments such as nationalisms and fundamentalisms which may certainly drive emancipatory projects such as anticolonial movements, but which – once autonomy is achieved – may also harden into another form of oppression. Thus at the start of the twentieth century “a highly successful, popular translation movement [...] contributed in a material way to the end of imperial domination in Ireland,” but “the image of the Irish constructed in large measure by translations of early Irish literature was the foundation of many of the reactionary features of Irish culture from the 1920s right to the 1970s” (Tymoczko 2000: 42–3). This point also applies to the situation of minority languages such as Québécois French, where a threat to the continued vitality of the language can lead not simply to governmental measures for preservation, but to notions of cultural purity that stigmatize foreign immigrants and potentially devolve into racism (see Brisset 1996: chap. 4). In such cases, foreignizing translation can be useful in enriching the minority language and culture while submitting them to ongoing interrogation. Because the precise nature of foreignizing translation varies with cultural situations and historical moments, what is foreignizing in one translation project will not necessarily be so in another. It remains true, nonetheless, that the current standard dialect of the translating language is the dominant choice for translation worldwide, suggesting that the foreignizing variations on this dialect adopted in the United Kingdom and the United States might travel to some extent or at least illuminate the possibilities for translation into languages other than English.

3 The symptomatic reading

Foreignization can alter the ways that translations are read as well as produced because it assumes a concept of human subjectivity that is very different from the humanist assumptions underlying domestication. Neither the foreign writer nor the translator is conceived as the transcendental origin of the text, freely expressing an idea about human nature or communicating it in transparent language to a reader from a different culture. Rather, subjectivity is constituted by cultural and social determinations that are diverse and even conflicting, that mediate any language use, and that vary with every cultural formation and every historical moment. Human action is intentional, but determinate, self-reflexively measured against social rules and resources, the heterogeneity of which allows for the possibility of change with every self-reflexive action (Giddens 1979: chap. 2). Textual production may be initiated and guided by the producer, but it puts to work various linguistic and cultural materials which make the text discontinuous, despite any appearance of unity, and which create an unconscious, a set of unacknowledged conditions that are both personal and social, psychological and ideological. Thus the translator not only consults but unwittingly absorbs many different materials in the receiving culture, ranging from dictionaries and grammars to patterns of usage to texts, translation strategies and translation traditions to values, paradigms and ideologies. Yet no translator will have all these materials and their diverse significance under his or her conscious control (see Venuti 2002). And although intended to reproduce the foreign text, the translator's consultation of them inevitably reduces and supplements it, even when foreign cultural materials are also consulted. Their sheer heterogeneity leads to discontinuities – between the foreign text and the translation and within the translation itself – that are symptomatic of its ethnocentric violence. A humanist practice of reading translations elides these discontinuities by locating a semantic unity adequate to the foreign text, stressing intelligibility, transparent communication, the use value of the translation in the receiving culture. A symptomatic reading, in contrast, locates discontinuities at the level of diction, syntax or discourse that reveal the translation to be a violent rewriting of the foreign text, a strategic intervention into the receiving culture, at once dependent on receptor values and variously in conformity with or abusive of them (cf. Althusser 1970: 28–9).

This practice of symptomatic reading can be illustrated with the translations of Freud's texts for the Standard Edition, although the translations acquired such unimpeachable authority that we needed Bruno Bettelheim's critique to become aware of the discontinuities. Bettelheim's point is that the translations make Freud's texts "appear to readers of English as abstract, depersonalized, highly theoretical, erudite, and mechanized – in short, 'scientific' – statements about the strange and very complex workings of our mind" (Bettelheim 1983: 5). Bettelheim seems to assume that a close examination of Freud's German is necessary to detect the translators' scientific strategy, but the fact is that his point can be demonstrated with no more than a careful reading of the English text. Bettelheim argues, for example, that in The Psychopathology of Everyday Life (1960), the term "parapraxis" reveals the scientism of the translation because it is used to render a rather simple German word, Fehlleistung, which Bettelheim himself prefers to translate as "faulty achievement" (Bettelheim 1983: 87). Yet the translator's strategy may also be glimpsed through certain peculiarities in the diction of the translated text:

I now return to the forgetting of names. So far we have not exhaustively considered either the case-material or the motives behind it. As this is exactly the kind of parapraxis that I can from time to time observe abundantly in myself, I am at no loss for examples. The mild attacks of migraine from which I still suffer usually announce themselves hours in advance by my forgetting names, and at the height of these attacks, during which I am not forced to abandon my work, it frequently happens that all proper names go out of my head.

(Freud 1960: 21)

The diction of much of this passage is so simple and common (“forgetting”), even colloquial (“go out of my head”), that “parapraxis” represents a conspicuous difference, an inconsistency in word choice which exposes the translation process. The inconsistency is underscored not only by Freud’s heavy reliance on anecdotal, “everyday” examples, some – as above – taken from his own experience, but also by a footnote added to a later edition of the German text and included in the English translation: “This book is of an entirely popular character; it merely aims, by an accumulation of examples, at paving the way for the necessary assumption of unconscious yet operative mental processes, and it avoids all theoretical considerations on the nature of the unconscious” (Freud 1960: 272n.). James Strachey himself unwittingly called attention to the inconsistent diction in his preface to Alan Tyson’s translation, where he felt it necessary to provide a rationale for the use of “parapraxis”: “In German ‘Fehlleistung,’ ‘faulty function.’ It is a curious fact that before Freud wrote this book the general concept seems not to have existed in psychology, and in English a new word had to be invented to cover it” (Freud 1960: viii n.). It can of course be objected (against Bettelheim) that the mixture of specialized scientific terms and commonly used diction is characteristic of Freud’s German, and therefore (against me) that the English translation in itself cannot be the basis for an account of the translators’ strategy. Yet although I am very much in agreement with the first point, the second weakens when we realize that even a comparison between the English versions of key Freudian terms easily demonstrates the inconsistency in kinds of diction I have located in the translated passage: “id” vs. “unconscious”; “cathexis” vs. “charge,” or “energy”; “libidinal” vs. “sexual.”

Bettelheim suggests some of the determinations that shaped the scientific translation strategy of the Standard Edition. One important consideration is the intellectual current that has dominated Anglo-American psychology and philosophy since the eighteenth century: “In theory, many topics with which Freud dealt permit both a hermeneutic-spiritual and a positivistic-pragmatic approach. When this is so, the English translators nearly always opt for the latter, positivism being the most important English philosophical tradition” (Bettelheim 1983: 44). But there are also the social institutions in which this tradition was entrenched and against which psychoanalysis had to struggle in order to gain acceptance in the post-World War II period. As Bettelheim concisely puts it, “psychological research and teaching in American universities are either behaviorally, cognitively, or physiologically oriented and concentrate almost exclusively on what can be measured or observed from the outside” (ibid.: 19). For psychoanalysis this meant that its assimilation in British and American cultures entailed a redefinition, in which it “was perceived in the United States as a practice that ought to be the sole prerogative of physicians” (ibid.: 33), “a medical specialty” (ibid.: 35), and this redefinition was carried out in a variety of social practices, including not only legislation by state assemblies and certification by the psychoanalytic profession, but the scientific translation of the Standard Edition:

When Freud appears to be either more abstruse or more dogmatic in English translation than in the original German, to speak about abstract concepts rather than about the reader himself, and about man’s mind rather than about his soul, the probable explanation isn’t mischievousness or carelessness on the translators’ part but a deliberate wish to perceive Freud strictly within the framework of medicine.

(Ibid.: 32)

The domesticating practice at work in the translations of the Standard Edition sought to assimilate Freud’s texts to the dominance of positivism in British and American cultures so as to facilitate the institutionalization of psychoanalysis in the medical profession and in academic psychology.

Bettelheim’s book is of course couched in the most judgmental of terms, and it is his negative judgment that must be avoided (or perhaps rethought) if we want to understand the manifold significance of the Standard Edition as a translation. Bettelheim views the work of Strachey and his collaborators as a distortion and a betrayal of Freud’s “essential humanism,” a view that points to a valorization of a concept of the transcendental subject in both Bettelheim and Freud. Bettelheim’s assessment of the psychoanalytic project is stated in his own humanistic versions for the Standard Edition’s “ego,” “id,” and “superego”: “A reasonable dominance of our I over our it and above-I – this was Freud’s goal for all of us” (Bettelheim 1983: 110). This notion of ego dominance conceives of the subject as the potentially self-consistent source of its knowledge and actions, not perpetually split by psychological (“id”) and social (“superego”) determinations over which it has no or limited control. The same assumption can often be seen in Freud’s German text: not only in his emphasis on social adjustment, for instance, as with the concept of the “reality principle,” but also in his repeated use of his own experience for analysis; both represent the subject as healing the determinate split in its own consciousness. Yet insofar as Freud’s various psychic models theorized the ever-present, contradictory determinations of consciousness, the effect of his work was to decenter the subject, to remove it from a transcendental realm of freedom and unity and view it as the determinate product of psychic and familial forces beyond its conscious control. These conflicting concepts of the subject underlie different aspects of Freud’s project: the transcendental subject, on the one hand, leads to a definition of psychoanalysis as primarily therapeutic, what Bettelheim calls a “demanding and potentially dangerous voyage of self-discovery [...] so that we may no longer be enslaved without knowing it to the dark forces that reside in us” (ibid.: 4); the determinate subject, on the other hand, leads to a definition of psychoanalysis as primarily hermeneutic, a theoretical apparatus with sufficient scientific rigor to analyze the shifting but always active forces that constitute and divide human subjectivity. Freud's texts are thus marked by a fundamental discontinuity, one which is "resolved" in Bettelheim's humanistic representation of psychoanalysis as compassionate therapy, but which is exacerbated by the scientific strategy of the English translations and their representation of Freud as the coolly analyzing physician.¹¹ The inconsistent diction in the Standard Edition, by reflecting the positivistic redefinition of psychoanalysis in Anglo-American institutions, signifies another, alternative reading of Freud that heightens the contradictions in his project.

It can be argued, therefore, that the inconsistent diction in the English translations does not really deserve to be judged erroneous; on the contrary, it discloses interpretive choices determined by a wide range of social institutions and cultural movements, some (like the specific institutionalization of psychoanalysis) calculated by the translators, others (like the dominance of positivism and the discontinuities in Freud's texts) remaining dimly perceived or entirely unconscious during the translation process. The fact that the inconsistencies have gone unnoticed for so long is perhaps largely the result of two mutually determining factors: the privileged status accorded the Standard Edition among English-language readers and the entrenchment of a positivistic reading of Freud in the Anglo-American psychoanalytic establishment. Hence, a different critical approach with a different set of assumptions becomes necessary to perceive the inconsistent diction of the translations: Bettelheim's particular humanism, or my own attempt to ground a symptomatic reading of translated texts on a foreignizing practice of translation that assumes a determinate concept of subjectivity. This sort of reading can be said to foreignize a domesticating translation by showing where it is discontinuous; a translation's dependence on dominant values in the receiving culture becomes most visible where it departs from them. Yet this reading also uncovers the domesticating movement involved in any foreignizing translation by showing where its construction of the foreign depends on receiving cultural materials.

Symptomatic reading can thus be useful in demystifying the illusion of transparency in a contemporary English-language translation. In some translations, the discontinuities are readily apparent, unintentionally disturbing the fluency of the language, revealing the inscription of the receiving culture; other translations bear prefaces that announce the translator's strategy and alert the reader to the presence of noticeable stylistic peculiarities. A case in point is Robert Graves's version of Suetonius's The Twelve Caesars. Graves's preface offered a frank account of his domesticating translation practice:

For English readers Suetonius's sentences, and sometimes even groups of sentences, must often be turned inside-out. Wherever his references are incomprehensible to anyone not closely familiar with the Roman scene, I have also brought up into the text a few words of explanation that would normally have appeared in a footnote. Dates have been everywhere changed from the pagan to the Christian era; modern names of cities used whenever they are more familiar to the common reader than the classical ones; and sums in sesterces reduced to gold pieces, at 100 to a gold piece (of twenty denarii), which resembled a British sovereign.

(Graves 1957: 8)

Graves's vigorous revision of the foreign text aims to assimilate the foreign-language culture (Imperial Rome) to that of the translating language (the United Kingdom in 1957). The work of assimilation depends not only on his extensive knowledge of Suetonius and Roman culture during the Empire (e.g. the monetary system), but also on his knowledge of contemporary British culture as manifested by English syntactical forms and what he takes to be the function of his translation. His "version," he wrote in the preface, was not intended to serve as a "school crib," but to be readable: "a literal rendering would be almost unreadable" (ibid.: 8) because it would adhere too closely to the Latin text, even to the Latin word order.

Graves sought to make his translation extremely fluent, and it is important to note that this was both a deliberate choice and culturally specific, determined by contemporary English-language values and not by any means absolute or originating with Graves in a fundamental way. On the contrary, the entire process of producing the translation, beginning with the very choice of the text and including both Graves's textual moves and the decision to publish the translation in paperback, was conditioned by factors like the decline in the study of classical languages among educated readers, the absence of another translation on the market, and the remarkable popularity of the novels that Graves himself created from Roman historians like Suetonius – I, Claudius and Claudius the God, both continuously in print since 1934. Graves's version of The Twelve Caesars appeared as one of the "Penguin Classics," a mass market imprint designed for both students and general readers.

As J. M. Cohen has observed, the translations in Penguin Classics were pioneering in their use of transparent discourse, "plain prose uniformity," largely in response to cultural and social conditions:

The translator [...] aims to make everything plain, though without the use of footnotes since the conditions of reading have radically changed and the young person of today is generally reading in far less comfortable surroundings than his father or grandfather. He has therefore to carry forward on an irresistible stream of narrative. Little can be demanded of him except his attention. Knowledge, standards of comparison, Classical background: all must be supplied by the translator in his choice of words or in the briefest of introductions.

(Cohen 1962: 33)

Graves's version of Suetonius reflects the cultural marginality of classical scholarship in the post-World War II period and the growth of a mass market for paperback literature, including the bestselling historical novels by which he made a living for many years. His translation was so effective in responding to this situation that it too became a bestseller, reprinted five times within a decade of publication. As Graves indicated in an essay on "Moral Principles in Translation," the "ordinary" reader of a classical text (Diodorus is his example) "wants mere factual information, laid out in good order for his hasty eye to catch" (Graves 1965: 51). Although Apuleius "wrote a very ornate North African Latin," Graves translated it "for the general public in the plainest possible prose." Making the foreign text "plain" means that Graves's translation practice is radically domesticating: it requires not merely the insertion of explanatory phrases, but the inscription of the foreign text with values that are not only anachronistic and ethnocentric, but dominant in the receiving culture. In the preface to his Suetonius, Graves made clear that he deliberately modernized and Anglicized the Latin. At one point, he considered adding an introductory essay that would signal the cultural and historical differences of the text by describing key political conflicts in late Republican Rome. But he finally omitted it: "most readers," he felt, "will perhaps prefer to plunge straight into the story and pick up the threads as they go along" (Graves 1957: 8), allowing his fluent prose to turn transparent and so conceal the domesticating work of the translation.

This work can be glimpsed in discontinuities between Graves's translation discourse and Suetonius's particular method of historical and biographical narrative. Graves's reading of Suetonius, as sketched in his preface, largely agreed with the contemporary academic reception of the Latin text. As the classicist Michael Grant has pointed out, Suetonius gathers together, and lavishly inserts, information both for and against [the rulers of Rome], usually without adding any personal judgment in one direction or the other, and above all without introducing the moralizations which had so frequently characterized Greek and Roman biography and history alike. Occasionally conflicting statements are weighed. In general, however, the presentation is drily indiscriminate. [...] the author's own opinions are rarely permitted to intrude, and indeed he himself, in collecting all this weird, fascinating material, appears to make little effort to reach a decision about the personalities he is describing, or to build up their characteristics into a coherent account. Perhaps, he may feel, that is how people are: they possess discordant elements which do not add up to a harmonious unity.

(Grant 1980: 8)

Grant's account suggests that the Latin text does not offer a coherent position of subjectivity for the reader to occupy: we are unable to identify with either the author ("the author's own opinions are rarely permitted to intrude") or the characters ("the personalities" are not given "a coherent account"). As a result, Suetonius's narrative may seem to possess a "relatively high degree of objectivity," but it also contains passages that provoke considerable doubt, especially since "his curiously disjointed and staccato diction can lead to obscurity" (ibid.: 7–8). Graves's fluent translation smooths out these features of the Latin text, insuring intelligibility, constructing a more coherent position from which the Caesars can be judged, and making any judgment seem true, right, obvious.

Consider this passage from the life of Julius Caesar:

Stipendia prima in Asia fecit Marci Thermi praetoris contubernio; a quo ad accersendam classem in Bithyniam missus desedit apud Nicomedem, non sine rumore prostratae regi pudicitiae; quem rumorem auxit intra paucos rursus dies repetita Bithynia per causam exigendae pecuniae, quae deberetur cuidam libertino clienti suo. reliqua militia secundiore fama fuit et a Thermo in expugnatione Mytilenarum corona civica donatus est.

Caesar first saw military service in Asia, where he went as aide-de-camp to Marcus Thermus, the provincial governor. When Thermus sent Caesar to raise a fleet in Bithynia, he wasted so much time at King Nicomedes' court that a homosexual relationship between them was suspected, and suspicion gave place to scandal when, soon after his return to headquarters, he revisited Bithynia: ostensibly collecting a debt incurred there by one of his freedmen. However, Caesar's reputation improved later in the campaign, when Thermus awarded him the civic crown of oak leaves, at the storming of Mytilene, for saving a fellow soldier's life.

(Graves 1957: 10)

Both passages rest on innuendo instead of explicit judgment, on doubtful hearsay instead of more reliable evidence ("rumorem," "suspicion"). Yet the English text makes several additions that offer more certainty about Caesar's motives and actions and about Suetonius's own estimation: the translation is not just slanted against Caesar, but homophobic. This first appears in an inconsistency in the diction: Graves's use of "homosexual relationship" to render "prostratae regi pudicitiae" ("surrendered his modesty to the king") is an anachronism, a late nineteenth-century scientific term that diagnoses same-sex sexual activity as pathological and is therefore inappropriate for an ancient culture in which sexual acts were not categorized according to the participants' sex (OED; Wiseman 1985: 10–14). Graves then leads the reader to believe that this relationship did in fact occur: not only does he increase the innuendo by using "suspicion gave place to scandal" to translate "rumorem auxit" ("the rumor spread"), but he inserts the loaded "ostensibly," entirely absent from the Latin text. Graves's version implicitly equates homosexuality with perversion, but since the relationship was with a foreign monarch, there are also political implications, the hint of a traitorous collusion which the ambitious Caesar is concealing and which he may later exploit in a bid for power: the passage immediately preceding this one has the dictator Sulla associating Caesar with his archenemy Marius. Because the passage is so charged with lurid accusations, even the conclusive force of that “however,” promising a rehabilitation of Caesar’s image, is finally subverted by the possible suggestion of another sexual relationship in “saving a fellow soldier’s life.”

Suetonius later touches on Caesar’s sexual reputation, and here too Graves’s version is marked by a homophobic bias:

Pudicitiae eius famam nihil quidem praeter Nicomedis contubernium laesit.

The only specific charge of unnatural practices ever brought against him was that he had been King Nicomedes’ catamite.

(Graves 1957: 30)

Where the Latin text makes rather general and noncommittal references to Caesar’s sexuality, Graves chooses English words that stigmatize same-sex sexual acts as perverse: a question raised about “pudicitiae eius famam” (“his sexual reputation”) becomes a “specific charge of unnatural practices,” while “contubernium” (“sharing the same tent,” “companionship,” “intimacy”) makes Caesar a “catamite,” a term of abuse in the early modern period for boys who were the sexual objects of men (OED). As an archaism, “catamite” deviates from the modern English lexicon used throughout this and other Penguin Classics, a deviation that is symptomatic of the domesticating process in Graves’s version. His prose is so lucid and supple that such symptoms can well be overlooked, enabling the translation to fix an interpretation while presenting that interpretation as authoritative, issuing from an authorial position that transcends linguistic and cultural differences to address the English-language reader. Graves’s interpretation, however, assimilates an ancient Latin text to contemporary British values. He punctures the myth of Caesar by equating the Roman dictatorship with sexual perversion, and this reflects a postwar homophobia that linked homosexuality with a fear of totalitarian government, communism, and political subversion through espionage. “In the Cold War,” Alan Sinfield notes, “prosecutions for homosexual ‘offences’ rose five times over in the 15 years from 1939,” and “communist homosexual treachery was witch-hunted close to the heart of the high-cultural establishment” (Sinfield 1989: 66, 299). Graves’s fluently translated Suetonius participated in this situation, not just by stigmatizing Caesar’s sexuality, but by presenting the stigma as historical fact. In the preface, Graves remarked that Suetonius “seems trustworthy,” but he also suggested inadvertently that this Roman historian shared sexual and political values currently prevailing in Britain: “his only prejudice being in favour of firm mild rule, with a regard for the human decencies” (Graves 1957: 7).

Foreignizing translations that are not transparent, that eschew fluency for a more heterogeneous mix of discourses, are equally partial in their interpretation of the foreign text, but they tend to flaunt their partiality instead of concealing it. Whereas Graves's Suetonius focuses on the signified, creating an illusion of transparency in which linguistic and cultural differences are domesticated, Ezra Pound's translations often focus on the signifier, creating an opacity that calls attention to itself and distinguishes the translation both from the foreign text and from prevailing values in the translating-language culture.

In Pound's work, foreignization sometimes takes the form of archaism. His version of "The Seafarer" (1912) departs from modern English by adhering closely to the Anglo-Saxon text, imitating its compound words, alliteration, and accentual meter, even resorting to calque renderings that echo Anglo-Saxon phonology: "bitre breostceare"/"bitter breast-cares"; "merewerges"/"mere-weary"; "corna caldast"/"corn of the coldest"; "floodwegas"/"flood-ways"; "hægl scurum fleag"/"hail-scur flew"; "mæw singende fore medodrinche"/"the mews' singing all my mead-drink." But Pound's departures from modern English also include archaisms drawn from later periods of English literature.

 feascaftig ferð frefran meahte.
 Forþon him gelyfeð lyt, se þe ah lifes wyn gebiden in burgum, bealosīþa hwon, wlonc ond wingal, hu ic werig oft in brimlade bidan sceolde.

(Krapp and Dobbie 1936: 144)

Not any protector
 May make merry man faring needy.
 This he little believes, who aye in winsome life
 Abides 'mid burghers some heavy business, Wealthy and wine-flushed, how I weary oft Must bide above brine.

(Pound 1954: 207)

The word "aye" ("always") is a Middle English usage that later appeared in Scottish and northern dialects, while "burghers" first emerges in the Elizabethan period (OED). The words "'mid" (for "amid") and "bide" are poeticisms used by such nineteenth-century writers as Scott, Dickens, Tennyson, Arnold, and Morris. Pound's lexicon in fact favors archaisms that have become poetical: "brine," "o'er," "pinion," "laud," "ado."

Such textual features indicate that a translation can be foreignizing only by putting to work cultural materials and agendas that are domestic, specific to the translating language, but also, in this case, anachronistic, specific to later periods. "The Seafarer" is informed by Pound's knowledge of English literature from its beginnings, but also by his modernist poetics, by his favoring, notably in The Cantos, an elliptical, fragmentary verse in which subjectivity is split and determinate, presented as a site of heterogeneous cultural discourses (Easthope 1983: chap. 9). The peculiarities of Pound's translation – the gnarled syntax, the reverberating alliteration, the densely allusive archaism – slow the movement of the monologue, resisting assimilation, however momentarily, to a coherent subject (whether “author” or “seafarer”) and foregrounding the various English dialects and literary discourses that get elided beneath the illusion of a speaking voice. This discursive strategy produces a foreignizing effect through its resistance to values that prevail in contemporary British and American cultures – the canon of fluency in translation, the dominance of transparent discourse, the individualistic illusion of authorial presence.

And yet Pound's translation reinscribes its own modernist brand of individualism by editing the Anglo-Saxon text. As the medievalist Christine Fell has remarked, this text contains “two traditions, the heroic, if we may so define it, preoccupation with survival of honour after loss of life – and the Christian hope for security of tenure in Heaven” (Fell 1991: 176). However these conflicting values entered the text, whether present in some initial oral version or introduced during a later monastic transcription, they project two contradictory concepts of subjectivity, one individualistic (the seafarer as his own person alienated from mead-hall as well as town), the other collective (the seafarer as a soul in a metaphysical hierarchy composed of other souls and dominated by God). Pound's translation resolves this contradiction by omitting the Christian references entirely, highlighting the strain of heroism in the Anglo-Saxon text, making the seafarer's “mind's lust” to “seek out foreign fastness” an example of “daring ado,/So that all men shall honour him after.” In Susan Bassnett's words, Pound's translation represents “the suffering of a great individual rather than the common suffering of everyman [...] a grief-stricken exile, broken but never bowed” (Bassnett 1980: 97). The archaizing translation strategy interferes with the individualistic illusion of transparency, but the revisions intensify the theme of heroic individualism, and hence the recurrent gibes at the “burgher” who complacently pursues his financial interests and “knows not [...] what some perform/Where wandering them widest draweth” (Pound 1954: 208). The revisions are symptomatic of the cultural political agenda that animates Pound's foreignizing translation, a peculiar ideological contradiction that distinguishes modernist literary experiments: the development of textual strategies that decenter the transcendental subject coincides with a recuperation of it through certain individualistic motifs like the “strong personality.” Ultimately, this contradiction constitutes a response to the crisis of human subjectivity that modernists perceived in social developments like monopoly capitalism, particularly the creation of a mass workforce and the standardization of the work process (Jameson 1979: 110–14).

The examples from Graves and Pound show that the aim of a symptomatic reading is not to assess the “freedom” or “fidelity” of a translation, but rather to uncover the canons of accuracy by which the translator produced and judged it. Fidelity cannot be construed as mere semantic equivalence: on the one hand, the foreign text is susceptible to many different interpretations, even at the level of the individual word; on the other hand, the translator's interpretive choices answer to a receiving cultural situation and so always exceed the foreign text. This does not mean that translation is forever banished to the realm of freedom or error, but that canons of accuracy are culturally specific and historically variable. Although Graves produced a free translation by his own admission, it has nonetheless been judged faithful and accepted as the standard English-language rendering by academic specialists like Grant. In 1979, Grant published an edited version of Graves's translation that pronounced it accurate, if not "precise":

[It] conveys the peculiarities of Suetonius's methods and character better than any other translation. Why, then, have I been asked to "edit" it? Because Robert Graves (who explicitly refrained from catering for students) did not aim at producing a precise translation – introducing, as he himself points out, sentences of explanation, omitting passages which do not seem to help the sense, and "turning sentences, and sometimes even groups of sentences, inside-out." [...] What I have tried to do, therefore, is to make such adjustments as will bring his version inside the range of what is now generally regarded by readers of the Penguin Classics as a "translation" – without, I hope, detracting from his excellent and inimitable manner.

In the twenty-two years separating Graves's initial version from the revised edition, the canons of accuracy underwent a change, requiring a translation to be both fluent and exact, to make for "vivid and compulsive reading" (ibid.: 8), but also to follow the foreign text more closely. The passages quoted earlier from the life of Caesar were evidently judged accurate in 1979, since Grant made only one revision: "catamite" was replaced by "bedfellow" (ibid.: 32). This change brings the English closer to the Latin ("contubernium"), but it also improves the fluency of Graves's prose by replacing an archaism with a more familiar contemporary usage. The revision is obviously too small to minimize the homophobia in the passages.

Pound's version of "The Seafarer" also cannot be simply questioned as too free because it is informed by the scholarly reception of the Anglo-Saxon text. As Bassnett has suggested, his omission of the Christian references, including the homiletic epilogue (ll. 103–24), is not so much a deviation from the text preserved in the Exeter Book, as an emendation that responds to a key question in historical scholarship: "Should the poem be perceived as having a Christian message as an integral feature, or are the Christian elements additions that sit uneasily over the pagan foundations?" (Bassnett 1980: 96). In English Literature from the Beginning to the Norman Conquest, for example, Stopford Brooke asserted that "it is true, the Seafarer ends with a Christian tag, but the quality of its verse, which is merely homiletic, has made capable persons give it up as a part of the original poem" (Brooke 1898: 153). Pound's translation can be considered accurate according to early twentieth-century academic standards, a translation that is simultaneously a plausible edition of the Anglo-Saxon text. His departures from the Exeter Book assumed a cultural situation in which Anglo-Saxon was still very much studied by readers, who could therefore be expected to appreciate the work of historical reconstruction implicit in his version of the poem.

The symptomatic reading is a historicist approach to the study of translations that aims to situate canons of accuracy in their specific cultural moments. Critical categories like “fluency” and “resistancy,” “domesticating” and “foreignizing,” can be defined only by referring to the formation of cultural discourses in which the translation is produced, and in which certain translation theories and practices are valued over others. At the same time, however, applying these critical categories in the study of translations is anachronistic: they are fundamentally determined by a cultural political agenda in the present, an opposition to the contemporary dominance of transparent discourse, to the privileging of a fluent domesticating practice that masks both the translator’s work and the asymmetrical relations – cultural, economic, political – between English-language nations and their others worldwide. Although a humanist theory and practice of translation is equally anachronistic, inscribing the foreign-language text with values that are current in the receiving culture, it is also dehistoricizing: the various conditions of translated texts and of their reception are concealed beneath concepts of transcendental subjectivity and transparent communication. A symptomatic reading, in contrast, is historicizing: it assumes a concept of determinate subjectivity that exposes both the ethnocentric violence of translating and the interested nature of its own historicist approach.

4 The genealogical method

The project of the present book is to combat the translator’s invisibility with a history of – and in opposition to – contemporary English-language translation. Insofar as it is a cultural history with a professed political agenda, it follows the genealogical method developed by Nietzsche and Foucault and abandons the two principles that govern much conventional historiography: teleology and objectivity. Genealogy is a form of historical representation that depicts, not a continuous progression from a unified origin, an inevitable development in which the past fixes the meaning of the present, but a discontinuous succession of division and hierarchy, domination and exclusion, which destabilize the seeming unity of the present by constituting a past with plural, heterogeneous meanings. In a genealogical analysis, writes Foucault, “what is found at the historical beginnings of things is not the inviolable identity of their origin; it is the dissension of other things. It is disparity” (Foucault 1977: 142). The possibility of recuperating these “other” meanings explodes the pretense of objectivity in conventional historiography: its teleological emphasis betrays a complicity with the continuance of past domination and exclusion into the present. Thus, history is shown to be a cultural political practice, a partial (i.e. at once selective and evaluative) representation of the past that actively intervenes into the present, even if the interests served by that intervention are not always made explicit or perhaps remain unconscious. For Foucault, a genealogical analysis is unique in affirming the interested nature of its historical representation, in taking a stand vis-à-vis the political struggles of its situation. And by locating what has been dominated or excluded in the past and repressed by conventional historiography, such an analysis can not only challenge the cultural and social conditions in which it is performed, but propose different conditions to be established in the future. History informed by genealogy, Foucault suggests, “should become a differential knowledge of energies and failings, heights and degenerations, poisons and antidotes. Its task is to become a curative science” (ibid.: 156). By constructing a differential representation of the past, genealogy both engages in present cultural debates and social conflicts and develops resolutions that project utopian images.

The Translator’s Invisibility intervenes against the translator’s situation and activity in contemporary British and American cultures by offering a series of genealogies that write the history of present. It traces the rise of transparent discourse in English-language translation from the seventeenth century onward, while searching the past for exits, alternative theories and practices in British, American, and several foreign-language cultures – German, French, Italian.¹² The chapters form an argument pursued chronologically, showing that the origins of fluent translating lie in various kinds of cultural domination and exclusion, but also that translation can serve a more democratic agenda in which excluded theories and practices are recovered and the prevailing fluency is not simply jettisoned but revised. The acts of recovery and revision that constitute this argument rest on extensive archival research, bringing to light forgotten or neglected translations and establishing an alternative tradition that somewhat overlaps with, but mostly differs from, the current canon of British and American literatures.

This book is motivated by a strong impulse to document the history of English-language translation, to uncover long-obscure translators and translations, to reconstruct their publication and reception, and to articulate significant controversies. The documentary impulse, however, serves the skepticism of symptomatic readings that interrogate the process of domestication in translated texts, both canonical and marginal, and reassess their usefulness in contemporary British and American cultures. The historical narratives in each chapter, grounded as they are on a diagnosis of current translation theory and practice, address key questions. What values in the receiving culture has transparent discourse at once inscribed and masked in foreign texts during its long domination? How has transparency shaped the canon of foreign literatures in English and the cultural identities of English-language nations? Why has transparency prevailed over other translation strategies in English, like Victorian archaism (Francis Newman, William Morris) and modernist experiments with heterogeneous discourses (Pound, Celia and Louis Zukofsky, Paul Blackburn)? What would happen if a translator tried to redirect the process of domestication by choosing foreign texts that deviated from transparent discourse and by translating them so as to signal their linguistic and cultural differences? Would this effort establish more democratic cultural exchanges? Would it change receiving cultural values? Or would it mean banishment to the fringes of British and American cultures?

Throughout, the emphasis is on humanistic translation, literary in the broadest sense (including not only conventional literary genres such as poetry and fiction, but also biography, history, philosophy, and psychology, among other genres and disciplines in the human sciences), as opposed to technical translation (commercial, diplomatic, legal, scientific). This emphasis is not due to the fact that humanistic translators today are any more invisible or exploited than their technical counterparts, who, whether freelance or employed by translation agencies, are not permitted to sign or copyright their work, let alone receive royalties (Fischbach 1992: 3). Rather, humanistic translation is emphasized because it has long set the standard applied in technical translation (viz. fluency), and, most importantly for present purposes, it has traditionally been the field where innovative theories and practices emerge. As Schleiermacher realized long ago, the choice of whether to domesticate or foreignize a foreign text has been allowed only to translators of literary and scholarly texts, not to translators of technical materials. Technical translation is fundamentally constrained by the exigencies of communication: since World War II, it has supported scientific research, geopolitical negotiation, and economic exchange, especially as multinational corporations seek the expansion of foreign markets and the creation of overseas workforces and thus increasingly require fluent, immediately intelligible translations of international treaties, legal contracts, technical information, and instruction manuals (Levy 1991: F5). Although in sheer volume and financial worth technical translation far exceeds the translation of literary texts (a recent estimate values the worldwide translation industry at $26 billion: Downey 2004), humanistic translation remains a cultural practice where the translator can experiment in the choice of foreign texts and in the development of discursive strategies, constrained primarily by the current situation in the receiving culture.

The ultimate aim of the book is to force translators and their readers to reflect on the ethnocentric violence of translation and hence to write and read translated texts in ways that recognize the linguistic and cultural differences of foreign texts. What I am advocating is not an indiscriminate valorization of every foreign culture or a metaphysical concept of foreignness as an essential value; indeed, the foreign text is privileged in a foreignizing translation only insofar as it enables a disruption of receiving cultural codes, so that its value is always strategic, depending on the cultural formation into which it is translated. The goal is rather to elaborate the theoretical, critical, and textual means by which translation can be studied and practiced as a locus of difference, instead of the homogeneity that widely characterizes it today.

Fluency emerges decisively in English-language translation during the early modern period, a feature of aristocratic literary culture in seventeenth-century England, and over the next two hundred years it is valued for diverse reasons, cultural and social, in accordance with the vicissitudes of the hegemonic classes. At the same time, the illusion of transparency produced in fluent translation enacts a thoroughgoing domestication that masks the manifold conditions of the translated text, its exclusionary impact on foreign cultural values, but also on those at home, eliminating translation strategies that resist transparent discourse, closing off any thinking about cultural and social alternatives that do not favor English social elites. The dominance of fluency in English-language translation until today has led to the forgetting of these conditions and exclusions, requiring their recovery to intervene against the contemporary phase of this dominance. The following genealogy aims to trace the rise of fluency as a canon of English-language translation, showing how it achieved canonical status, interrogating its exclusionary effects on the canon of foreign literatures in English, and reconsidering the cultural and social values that it excludes at home.

I Translation and royalist cultural politics

In 1656, Sir John Denham published a translation with the running title, The Destruction of Troy: An Essay upon the Second Book of Virgils Aeneis. Written in the year, 1636. The title page is one among many remarkable things about this book: it omits any sign of authorship in favor of a bold reference to the gap between the dates of composition and publication. Most early seventeenth-century translations of classical texts are published with a signature, if not a full name (John Ashmore, John Ogilby, Robert Stapylton, John Vicars), then at least initials and some indication of social position, “Sir T.H.,” “W.L., Gent.” Denham’s omission of his name may be taken as the self-effacing gesture of a courtly amateur, presenting himself as not seriously pursuing a literary career, not asserting any individualistic concept of authorship (the title page presents the translation as no more than an “essay”) and thus implying that his text is the fruit of hours idle, not spent in the employ of royal authority, in political office or military service.¹ The title page presented Denham’s text as a distinctively aristocratic gesture in literary translation, typical of court culture in the Tudor and Stuart periods, and this is clear even in the imprint, “For Humphrey Moseley,” one of the most active publishers of elite literature during the seventeenth century and a staunch royalist who advertised his political views in the prefaces to his publications. Once the social conditions of Denham’s book are recognized, the temporal gap indicated by the dates on the title page fills with significance from his own activities in support of the royalist cause, both in the royal government and army during the civil wars and for the exiled royal family and court during the Interregnum. Perhaps the omission of his name should also be taken as an effort to conceal his identity, a precaution taken by royalist writers who intended their work to be critical of the Commonwealth (Potter 1989: 23–4).

“Written in 1636” proclaimed a continuity between Denham’s translation and the years when court poetry and drama were setting the dominant literary trends in England, when the Caroline experiment in absolutism reached its apex, and when Denham himself, the 20-year-old son of a baron of the Exchequer, was preparing for a legal career at Lincoln’s Inn, dabbling in literary pursuits like translating the Aeneid. The Destruction of Troy was revised and published much later, in 1656 – after Denham returned from several years of exile with the Caroline court in France, soon after he was arrested in the Commonwealth’s campaign to suppress royalist insurgency, a suspect in a military counterplot, and just a year after the second edition of the text by which he is best remembered today, Coopers Hill (1642), a topographical poem that offers a politically tendentious evocation of English history on the eve of the civil wars (O’Hehir 1968; Underdown 1960). At this later juncture, Denham’s translation assumes the role of a cultural political practice: “Written in 1636” it functions partly as a nostalgic glance back towards less troubled times for royal hegemony and partly as a strategic cultural move in the present, wherein Denham plans to develop a royalist aesthetic in translation to be implemented now and in the future, when hegemony is regained. “The hope of doing [Virgil] more right,” Denham asserted in his preface, “is the only scope of this Essay, by opening this new way of translating this Author, to those whom youth, leisure, and better fortune makes fitter for such undertakings” (Denham 1656: A2^v). Denham saw his audience as the coming generations of English aristocracy, who, unlike him, would have the “better fortune” of escaping social displacement in civil wars.

The aristocratic affiliation would have also been perceived by contemporary readers from various classes and with differing political tendencies. The translation was cited in “An Advertisement of Books newly published” that appeared in Mercurius Politicus, the widely circulated newsweekly licensed by Parliament to present a propagandistic survey of current events (Frank 1961: 205–10, 223–6). The notice revealed the translator’s identity and used the title “Esquire,” indicating not only his status as a gentleman, but perhaps his legal education as well: “The Destruction of Troy; an Essay upon the second Book of Virgils Aeneis. Written by JOHN DENHAM, Esquire” (Mercurius Politicus 1656).

The social functioning of Denham’s translation becomes clear when his preface is considered in a broader context of translation theory and practice during the seventeenth century. The first point to observe is that Denham’s “way of translating” was hardly “new” in 1656. He was following Horace’s dictum in Ars Poetica that the poet should avoid any word-for-word rendering: “For, being a Poet, thou maist feigne, create, / Not care, as thou wouldst faithfully translate, / To render word for word” – in Ben Jonson’s un-Horatian, line-by-line version from 1605 (Jonson 1968: 287). But where Horace took translation as one practice of the poet, Denham took poetry as the goal of poetry translation: “I conceive it a vulgar error in translating Poets, to affect being Fides Interpres,” he wrote, because poetic discourse requires more latitude to capture its “spirit” than a close adherence to the foreign text would allow (Denham 1656: A2^v–A3^r). Denham’s term “fides interpres” refers to translations of classical poetry that aim for such an adherence, made not by poets, but by scholars, including scholarly poets (Jonson’s Horace) and teachers who translate to produce school textbooks. John Brinsley described his 1633 prose version of Virgil’s Eclogues as Translated Grammatically, and also according to the proprietie of our English tongue, so farre as Grammar and the verse will well permit. Written chiefly for the good of schooles, to be used according to the directions in the Preface to the painfull Schoolemaster.

Denham’s slur against this strategy is tellingly couched in class terms: “I conceive it a vulgar error.”

Still, in recommending greater freedom against the grammarians, Denham was advocating a classical translation practice that reemerged in England decades before he published his version of Virgil (Amos 1920). Thomas Phaer, whose translations of the Aeneid date back to 1558, asserted that he “followed the counsell of Horace, teaching the duty of a good interpretour, Qui quae desperat nitescere possit, relinquit, by which occasion, somewhat, I haue in places omitted, somewhat altered” (Phaer 1620: V2^r). A freer approach was advocated with greater frequency from the 1620s onward, especially in aristocratic and court circles. Sir Thomas Hawkins, a Catholic who was knighted by James I and whose translations of Jesuit tracts were dedicated to Queen Henrietta Maria, prefaced his many (no doubt) will say, Horace is by mee forsaken, his Lyrick softnesse, and emphaticall Muse maymed: That in all there is a generall defection from his genuine Harmony. Those I must tell, I haue in this translation, rather sought his Spirit, then Numbers; yet the Musique of Verse not neglected neither.

1625 selection of Horace's odes by fending off complaints that he did not imitate classical meters:

(Hawkins 1625: A^r–A^v; DNB)

In a 1628 version of Virgil's eclogues that imposed a courtly aesthetic on the Latin text, "W.L., Gent." felt compelled to justify his departures with a similar apology:

Some Readers I make no doubt they wil meet with in these dainty mouth'd times, that will taxe them, for not comming resolved word for word, and line for line with the Author [...] I used the freedome of a Translator, not tying myselfe to the tyranny of a Grammatical construction, but breaking the shell into many peeces, was only carefull to preserve the Kernell safe and whole, from the violence of a wrong, or wrested Interpretation.

(Latham 1628: 6^r; Patterson 1987: 164–8)

As early as 1616, Barten Holyday, who became chaplain to Charles I and was created doctor of divinity at the king's order, introduced his translation of Persius by announcing that "I haue not herein bound my selfe with a ferularie superstition to the letter: but with the ancient libertie of a Translator, haue vsed a moderate paraphrase, where the obscuritie did more require it" (Holyday 1635: A5^r–A5^v; DNB). Holyday articulated the opposition to the grammarians that Denham would later join, and with a similarly Latinate tag, calling close translation "a ferularie superstition," belief propagated with the rod (ferula), school discipline – a joke designed especially for a grammarian.

In 1620, Sir Thomas Wroth, a member of the Somerset gentry who affected the literary pursuits of a courtly amateur (he called his epigrams The Abortive of an Idle Houre), anticipated Denham in several respects (DNB). Wroth likewise chose to translate the second book of the Aeneid and to call it The Destruction of Troy, but he also defined his translatorly "freedome" in "A Request to the Reader":

Giue not vp your casting verdict rashly, though you find mee sometimes wandring (which I purposely do) out of the visible bounds, but deliberately take notice that I stray not from the scope and intent of the Author, justified by the best Commentaries: and so I leaue you to reade, to vnderstand, and to encrease.

Wroth's free translation ultimately rested on a scholarly rationale ("Commentaries") reminiscent of Jonson's neoclassicism. And indeed Wroth's farewell to the reader ("to reade, to vnderstand, and to encrease") echoed the exhortation with which Jonson opened his Epigrammes (1616): "Pray thee, take care, that tak'st my booke in hand, / To reade it well: that is, to understand" (Jonson 1968: 4). In 1634, Sir Robert Stapylton, a gentleman in ordinary of the privy chamber to the Prince of Wales, published a version of book 4 of the Aeneid in which he anticipated Denham both by questioning any close rendering of poetry and by assigning free translation the same class affiliation:

It is true that wit distilled in one Language, cannot be transfused into another without losse of spirits: yet I presume such graces are retained, as those of the Noblest quality will favour this Translation, from an Original, that was sometimes the unenvied Favourite of the greatest Roman Emperour.

(Stapylton 1634: A4^v; DNB)

Denham consolidated the several-decades-long emergence of a neoclassical translation practice in aristocratic literary culture. It may have seemed "new" to him, not because it did not have any previous advocates, but because it did: it was a modern revival of an ancient literary practice, making Denham's translation a simulacral "Copy" of Virgil's true "Original," rationalized with a Platonic theory of translation as the copy of a copy of the truth: "I have made it my principal care to follow him, as he made it his to follow Nature in all his proportions" (Denham 1656: A3^v). But Denham's sense of his own modernity was less philosophical than political, linked to a specific class and nation. Coming back from exile in France, he may have found his translation practice "new" in the sense of foreign, in fact French. French literary culture in the 1640s was characterized by theories and practices advocating the free translation of classical texts, and Denham, among such other exiled royalist writers as Abraham Cowley and Sir Richard Fanshawe, was no doubt acquainted with the work of its leading French proponent, Nicolas Perrot d'Ablancourt, a prolific translator of Greek and Latin.² D'Ablancourt's freedom with Tacitus set the standard. In his preface to his version of the Annals, he wrote that la diversité qui se trouve dans les langues est si grande, tant pour la construction et la forme des périodes, que pour les figures et les autres ornemens, qu'il faut a tous coups changer d'air et de visage, si l'on ne veut faire un corps monstreux, tel que celui des traductions ordinaires, qui sont ou mortes et languissantes, ou confuses, et embrouillées, sans aucun ordre ny agrément.

the diversity that one finds amongst languages is so great, in the construction and shape of periods as well as in figures and other ornaments, that at every turn one must adopt a different air and visage, unless one wishes to create a monstrous body, such as those of ordinary translations, which are either dead and listless or confused and muddled, without any order or charm.

(D'Ablancourt 1640)

Compare Denham's preface: "Poesie is of so subtle a spirit, that in pouring out of one Language into another, it will all evaporate; and if a new spirit be not added in the transfusion, there will remain nothing but a Caput mortuum" (Denham 1656: A3^r). Denham echoed D'Ablancourt's body/soul metaphor, although following Stapylton's example ("wit distilled in one Language, cannot be transfused into another without losse of spirits") he imagined translation alchemically, as a distillation in which the residue was termed a caput mortuum (OED; Hermans 1985: 122). The alchemical image indicated that a free translation effected a radical change, in which what "was borne a Forraigner" can now be "esteeme[d] as a Native" – or, in this case, English (Stapylton 1634: A2^r).

The "new spirit" that is "added" with this free approach involves a process of domestication, in which the foreign text is imprinted with values specific to the receiving culture. D'Ablancourt called it "changer d'air et de visage." The elliptical, discontinuous discourse of Tacitus must be translated without offending the delicacy of our language and the correctness of the argument. [...] One is often forced to add something to his thought in order to clarify it; at times it is necessary to retrench one part in order to give birth to all the rest.

(D'Ablancourt 1640)

Henry Rider reverted to a clothing metaphor in the preface of his 1638 translation of Horace:

Translations of Authors from one language to another, are like old garments turn'd into new fashions; in which though the stuffe be still the same, yet the die and trimming are altered, and in the making, here something added, there something cut away.

(Rider 1638: A3^r)

Denham's formulation used a similar metaphor while nodding towards the classical author with whom D'Ablancourt pioneered free translation:

as speech is the apparel of our thoughts, so are there certain Garbs and Modes of speaking, which vary with the times [...] and this I think Tacitus means, by that which he calls Sermonem temporis istius auribus accommodatum [...] and therefore if Virgil must needs speak English, it were fit he should speak not only as a man of this Nation, but as a man of this age.

(Denham 1656: A3^v)

Denham's advocacy of free translation was laden with a nationalism that, even if expressed with courtly self-effacement, ultimately led to a contradictory repression of the practice's parallels and influences, foreign as well as English:

if this disguise I have put upon him (I wish I could give it a better name) fit not naturally and easily on so grave a person, yet it may become him better than that Fools-Coat wherein the French and Italian have of late presented him.

(Denham 1656: A3^v)

Denham sought to distinguish his translation from burlesque versions of the Aeneid that were fashionable on the Continent, Paul Scarron's Virgile Travesti (1648–9) and Giovanni Battista Lalli's Eneide Travestita (1633) (Scarron 1988: 10). He, like other translators associated with the exiled Caroline court, was following another French fashion in translation, although one linked closer to a monarchy whose absolutist experiment proved effective: D'Ablancourt's version of the Annals was dedicated to the powerful royal minister Cardinal Richelieu. Denham's translation of Virgil in fact reflects the strong resemblance between English and French translation practices during the period. But the deep nationalism of this practice works to conceal its origins in another national culture – a contradiction that occurs in Denham's case because the practice answers so specifically to an English problem: the need for a “new” form of writing that will enable the defeated royalist segment of the Caroline aristocracy to regain its hegemonic status in English culture. In his commendatory verses “To Sir Richard Fanshawe upon his Translation of Pastor Fido” (1648), Denham calls free translation “a new and nobler way” (Steiner 1975: 63). Given the political significance of this approach, it is important for Denham to translate a text in a genre that treats nobility, the epic, and to refuse the French burlesques that debased Virgil's aristocratic theme by treating social inferiors in the epic manner.

Denham's intention to enlist translation in a royalist cultural politics at home is visible both in his selection of the foreign text and in the discursive strategies he adopted in his version. The choice to translate Virgil's Aeneid in early modern England could easily evoke Geoffrey of Monmouth's legend that Brute, the grandson of Aeneas, founded Britain and became the first in a succession of British monarchs. Although this like the Arthurian legends was losing credibility among historians and antiquarians, the matter of Troy continued to be the cultural support of a strong nationalism, and it was repeatedly revised from different and often conflicting ideological standpoints in a wide range of texts – from William Camden's Britannia (1586) to Jonson's Speeches at Prince Henry's Barriers (1609) to Thomas Heywood's Life of Merlin (1641).³ The early Stuart kings were often given a Trojan genealogy. Anthony Munday's contribution to the royal progress through London, The Triumphs of Re-united Britannia (1605), referred to James I as "our second Brute"; Heywood described his narrative as "a Chronographically History of all the Kings and memorable passages of this kingdom, from Brute to the Reigne of our Royall Sovereigne King Charles" (Parsons 1929: 403, 407). In the political debates during the Interregnum, a Trojan genealogy could be used to justify both representative government and absolute monarchy. In 1655, the parliamentarian polemicist William Prynne interpreted the significance of the legend as "1. A Warre to shake off Slavery, and recover publick Liberty. 2. A kinde of Generall Parliamentary Councell summoned by Brute"; whereas in a legal commentary published in 1663 Edward Waterhouse argued that Brute "by his consent to reward the valour and fidelity of his Companions" instituted laws "both touching his Royal Prerogative, and their civil Security in life, member, goods and Lawes" (Jones 1944: 401, 403).

Denham's own appropriation of the Brute legend in Coopers Hill swells with patriotic fervor, but it also possesses the awareness that the Trojan genealogy is a legend, increasingly under attack yet able to function in cultural political struggles, and even, somewhat contradictorily, true. In a passage that reflects on the vista of London and environs, Denham writes that "The Gods great Mother," Cybele, cannot boast

 Amongst that numerous, and Celestiall hoast,
 More Hero's than can Windsor, nor doth Fames Immortall booke record more noble names.
 Not to look back so far, to whom this Ile
 Owes the first Glory of so brave a pile,
 Whether to Caesar, Albanact, or Brute,
 The Brittish Arthur, or the Danish Knute, (Though this of old no lesse contest did move, Than when for Homers birth seven Cities strove)
 But who soere it was, Nature design'd
 First a brave place, and then as brave a minde.
 (Denham 1969: 67)

The mention of "contest" in the parenthetical remark seems at first to question the credibility of heroic genealogies for English kings, whether historical or literary: "contest" as a reference to the historiographical "controversy" or "debate." But the couplet quickly shifts the issue from credibility to social effectivity: even if of questionable authenticity, poetic genealogies ("Homers birth") are cultural capital and can motivate political and military conflict. In England's case, however, the heroic genealogies are metaphysically validated, by "Nature design'd." For Denham, the Brute legend constituted a strategic move in an ideological cultural practice, poetry in the service of a specific political agenda. But, like many of his contemporaries, he was apt to mask these material conditions with providentialist claims and appeals to natural law that underwrite a notion of racial superiority.

Denham's choice of Virgil's Aeneid was uniquely suited to the nationalistic leanings of his domesticating translation practice. And in line with the recurrent Trojan genealogies of English kings, his choice of an excerpt he entitled The Destruction of Troy allowed him to suggest, more directly, the defeat of the Caroline government and his support for monarchy in England. Denham's political designs can be seen, first, in his decision to prepare book 2 for publication. In 1636 he had written a version of the Aeneid 2–6, and in 1668 he revised and published part of 4 under the title, The Passion of Dido for Aeneas. In 1656 he chose to issue the excerpt whose "argument," the fall of Troy, better lent itself to topicality. The topical resonance of his version becomes strikingly evident when it is juxtaposed to the Latin text and previous English versions. Book 2 had already been done in several complete translations of the Aeneid, and it had been singled out twice by previous translators, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, and Sir Thomas Wroth. Yet both of them had rendered the entire book (some 800 lines of Latin text). Denham, in contrast, published an abbreviated translation (some 550 lines) that ended climactically with Priam's death.

haec finis Priami fatorum, hic exitus illum
 sorte tulit Troiam incensam et prolapsa uidentem Pergama, tot quodam populis terrisque superbum regnatorem Asiae. iacet ingens litore truncus, auulsumque umeris caput et sine nomine corpus.

(Mynors 1969: ll. 554–8)

Thus fell the King, who yet surviv'd the State,
 With such a signal and peculiar Fate.
 Under so vast a ruine not a Grave,
 Nor in such flames a funeral fire to have:
 He, whom such Titles swell'd, such Power made proud
 To whom the Scepters of all Asia bow'd,
 On the cold earth lies th'unregarded King,
 A headless Carkass, and a nameless Thing.

(Denham 1656: ll. 542–9)

By removing the character and place names in the Latin text ("Priami," "Troiam," and "Pergama," the citadel at Troy) and referring only to "the King," Denham generalizes the import of the passage, enabling Priam's "headless Carkass" to metamorphose into a British descendant's, at least for a moment, inviting the contemporary English reader to recall the civil wars – although from a decidedly royalist point of view. Denham's translation shared the same impulse towards political allegory that characterized, not only the various revisions of Coopers Hill, but also royalist writing generally during the years after Charles's defeat, including

Fanshawe's translation of Guarini's Il Pastor Fido (1647) and Christopher Wase's translation of Sophocles' Electra (1649).⁴

The one place name Denham includes in his version of Priam's death, "Asia," may be taken as an allusion to the Orientalism in Caroline court culture. Denham had himself contributed to this trend with The Sophy (1642), a play intended for court production and set in Persia. But the allusiveness of the translation is more specific. "The Scepters of all Asia bow'd" to Charles in court masques where the king and queen enacted a moral conquest of foreign rulers by converting their nations to Platonic love. In Aurelian Townshend's Tempe Restor'd (1632), the royal couple preside over the reformation of Circe's sensual reign, figured in "all the Antimasques, consisting of Indians and Barbarians, who naturally are bestiall, and others which are voluntaries, but halfe transformed into beastes" (Townshend 1983: 97).

Yet more striking is Denham's curious addition to the Latin text: "Thus fell the King, who yet survived the State, / With such a signal and peculiar Fate." Virgil's lack of any reference to the dead king's afterlife reveals Denham's own belief in the continuing vitality of the Stuart monarchy after the regicide. Although Charles I was executed, the monarchy "survived the State" instituted by Parliament, initially a Commonwealth governed by a Council of State, which was later redefined to function as an adviser to a Lord Protector; this was a "signal and peculiar" survival for the king because it took the form of a court in exile and royalist conspiracy at home, because, in other words, the king lived on but not in his kingdom. In the political climate of the 1650s, with the Protectorate resorting to oppressive measures to quell royalist insurgency, it would be difficult for a Caroline sympathizer not to see any parallel between the decapitations of Priam and Charles. But in this climate it would also be necessary for a royalist writer like Denham to use such an oblique mode of reference as an allusion in an anonymous translation. Translation was particularly useful in royalist cultural politics, Lois Potter suggests, because it was viewed as "transcendence, the healing wholeness that removes controversy and contradiction" (Potter 1989: 52–3). In Denham's translation, the monarchy "survived" its destruction.

The fact that Denham intended his translation to serve a royalist function is borne out by a comparison with his predecessors, which highlights the subtle changes he introduced to bring the Latin text closer to his political concerns:

Of Priamus this was the fatal fine,
 The wofull end that was alotted him.
 When he had seen his palace all on flame,
 With the ruine of his Troyan turrets eke,
 That royal prince of Asie, which of late Reignd over so many peoples and realmes,
 Like a great stock now lieth on the shore:
 His hed and shoulders parted ben in twaine:
 A body now without renome, and fame.

(Howard 1557: cii^v)

See here King Priams end of all the troubles he had knowne, Behold the period of his days, which fortune did impone.
When he had seene his Citie raz'd, his Pallace, Temples fir'd,
And he who to th'Imperiall rule of Asia had aspir'd,
Proud of his Territories, and his people heeretofore,
Was then vnto the sea side brought, and headlesse in his gore:
Without respect his body lay in publike view of all.

(Wroth 1620: E3')

This was king Priams end, this his hard fate,
To live to see Troy fir'd, quite ruinate:
Even he, who once was Asia's Keisar great,
Mightiest in men, and spacious regall seat:
A despicable trunk (now) dead on ground,
His head cut off, his carcasse no name found.

(Vicars 1632: 48)

So finish'd Priams Fates, and thus he dy'd, Seeing Troy burn, whose proud commands did sway
So many powerful Realms in Asia;
Now on the strand his sacred body lyes
Headless, without a Name or Obsequies.

(Ogilby 1654: 217, 219)⁵

Denham clearly exceeds his predecessors in the liberties he takes with the Latin text. His addition about the “signal and peculiar Fate” becomes more conspicuous and historically charged in such a comparison, as does his deletion of local markers, including the Latin “litore” (l. 557), a word that situates Priam’s fall near the sea and is rendered by most of the other translators (“shore,” “sea side,” “strand”). Denham’s translation not only allows the death to be shifted inland, but throughout he makes a noticeable effort to domesticate architectural terms, likening the Trojan structures to the royal buildings in England. Consider this passage where the Greeks are forcing their way into Priam’s palace:

Automedon

And Periphas who drove the winged steeds,
Enter the Court; whom all the youth succeeds
Of Scyros Isle, who flaming firebrands flung Up to the roof, Pyrrhus himself among The foremost with an Axe an entrance hews
Through beams of solid Oak, then freely views
The Chambers, Galleries, and Rooms of State,
Where Priam and the ancient Monarchs sate.
At the first Gate an Armed Guard appears;
But th'Inner Court with horror, noise and tears

Confus'dly fill'd, the womens shrieks and cries
 The Arched Vaults re-echo to the skies;
 Sad Matrons wandering through the spacious Rooms Embrace and kiss the Posts: Then Pyrrhus comes Full of his Father, neither Men nor Walls
 His force sustain, the torn Port-cullis falls,
 Then from the hinge, their strokes the Gates divorce:

Then they the secret Cabinets invade,
 (Denham 1656: ll. 453–80, 491)

Denham's "Chambers, Galleries, and Rooms of State," "Inner Court," "Arched Vaults," "secret Cabinets" render various Latin terms, but the Latin is much less defined, and it noticeably refers to a different architecture: "domus intus," "domus interior" ("the house within"), "atria longa" ("long halls"), "penetralia" ("interior"), "cauae" ("hollow places"), "thalami" ("the women's bed rooms") (Mynors 1969: ll. 484–7, 503). Although the renderings used by Denham's predecessors display a degree of domestication as well, they do not match the extremity of his: "the house, the court, and secret chambers eke," "the palace within," "the hollow halles" (Howard 1557: cⁱ); "the roomes, and all that was within," "the spacious pallace" (Wroth 1620: Eⁱ); "the rooms within, great halls and parlours faire," "the rooms within" (Vicars 1632: 45); "the house within," "long halls," "Priams bed-chamber," "arched Sielings" (Ogilby 1654: 215). And Denham is alone in using "Portcullis" for the Latin "postes" ("door-posts"), refusing such previous and likely renderings as "pillars," "gates," and "posts" for a word that conjures up the architectural structure most closely associated with aristocracy and monarchy, the castle. Denham's architectural lexicon permits the description of the Greek attack to evoke other, more recently besieged castles, like Windsor Castle stormed by the parliamentary armies, or perhaps Farnham Castle, where in 1642 Denham was forced to surrender the royal garrison he commanded there. Denham's domesticating translation casts the destruction of Troy in a form that resonates with certain moments in English history, those when aristocratic rule was dominant (the medieval past) or allied, however tenuously, with the monarchy (the absolutist experiment of the 1630s) or decisively defeated and displaced (the civil wars and Interregnum).

There are other senses in which Denham's decision to translate book 2 of the Aeneid addressed the displaced royalist segment of the Caroline aristocracy. By choosing this book, he situated himself in a line of aristocratic translators that stretched back to Surrey, a courtly amateur whose literary activity was instrumental in developing the elite court cultures of the Tudor and Stuart monarchs. From Tottel's Miscellany (1557) on, Surrey was recognized as an important innovator of the sonnet and love lyric, but his work as a translator also possessed a cultural significance that would not have been lost on Denham: Surrey's translation of Virgil proved to be a key text in the emergence of blank verse as a prevalent poetic form in the period. Following Surrey's example, Denham turned to book 2 to invent a practice of poetry translation that would likewise prove culturally significant for his class. His aim was not only to reformulate the free approach practiced in Caroline aristocratic culture at its height, during the 1620s and 1630s, but to devise a discursive strategy for translation that would reestablish the cultural dominance of this class: this strategy can be called fluency.

A free translation of poetry required the cultivation of a fluent strategy in which linear syntax, univocal meaning, and varied meter produce an illusionistic effect of transparency: the translation seems as if it were not in fact a translation, but a text originally written in English.⁶ In the preface to his 1632 Aeneid, John Vicars described "the manner, wherein I have aimed at these three things, Perspicuity of the matter, Fidelity to the authour, and Facility or smoothnes to recreate thee my reader" (Vicars 1632: A3^r). In Denham's words, the translation should "fit" the foreign text "naturally and easily." Fluency is impossible to achieve with close or "verbal" translation, which inhibits the effect of transparency, making the translator's language seem foreign: "whosoever offers at Verbal Translation," wrote Denham, shall have the misfortune of that young Traveller, who lost his own language abroad, and brought home no other instead of it: for the grace of Latine will be lost by being turned into English words; and the grace of the English, by being turned into the Latin Phrase.

(Denham 1656: A3^r)

Denham's privileging of fluency in his own translation practice becomes clear when his two versions of Aeneid 2 are compared. The 1636 version is preserved in the commonplace book of Lucy Hutchinson, wife of the parliamentary colonel, John Hutchinson, with whom Denham attended Lincoln's Inn between 1636 and 1638 (O'Hehir 1968: 12–13). The book contains Denham's translation of Aeneid 2–6 – complete versions of 4–6, partial ones of 2 and 3. Book 2 is clearly a rough draft: not only does it omit large portions of the Latin text, but some passages do not give full renderings, omitting individual Latin words. There is also a tendency to follow the Latin word order, in some cases quite closely. The example cited by Theodore Banks is the often quoted line "timeo Danaos et dona ferentes," which Denham rendered virtually word for word as "The Grecians most when bringing gifts I feare" (Denham 1969: 43–4). The convoluted syntax and the pronounced metrical regularity make the line read awkwardly, without "grace." In the 1656 version, Denham translated this line more freely and strove for greater fluency, following a recognizably English word order and using metrical variations to smooth out the rhythm: "Their swords less danger carry than their gifts" (Denham 1656: l. 48).

Denham's fluent strategy is most evident in his handling of the verse form, the heroic couplet. The revision improved both the coherence and the continuity of the couplets, avoiding metrical irregularities and knotty constructions, placing the caesura to reinforce syntactical connections, using enjambment and closure to subordinate the rhyme to the meaning, sound to sense:

While all intent with heedfull silence stand
Aeneas spake O queene by your command
My countries fate our dangers & our feares
While I repeate I must repeate my feares
(1636: ll. 1–4)

While all with silence & attention wait,
Thus speaks Aeneas from the bed of State:
Madam, when you command us to review
Our Fate, you make our old wounds bleed anew
(1656: ll. 1–4)

We gave them gon & to Micenas sayld from her long sorrow Troy herselfe unvaild
The ports throwne open all with ioy resort
To see ye Dorick tents ye vacant port
(1636: ll. 26–9)

We gave them gone, and to Mycenae sail'd,
And Troy reviv'd, her mourning face unvail'd;
All through th'unguarded Gates with joy resort
To see the slighted Camp, the vacant Port;
(1656: ll. 26–9)

Guilt lent him rage & first possesst
The credulous rout with vaine reports nor ceast
But into his designes ye prophett drew
But why doe I these thanklesse truths persue
(1636: ll. 95–8)

Old guilt fresh malice gives; The peoples ears
He fills with rumors, and their hearts with fears,
And them the Prophet to his party drew.
But why do I these thankless truths pursue;
(1656: ll. 95–8)

While Laocoon on Neptunes sacred day
By lot designed a mighty bull did slay
Twixt Tenedos & Troy the seas smooth face
Two serpents with their horrid folds embrace Above the deepe they rayse their scaly crests

And stem ye flood with their erected brests
 Then making towards the shore their tayles they wind
 In circling curles to strike ye waves behind
 (1636: ll. 196–203)

Laocoon, Neptunes Priest, upon the day
 Devoted to that God, a Bull did slay,
 When two prodigious serpents were describe,
 Whose circling stroaks the Seas smooth face divide;
 Above the deep they raise their scaly Crests,
 And stem the fload with their erected brests,
 Their winding tails advance and steer their course,
 And ‘gainst the shore the breaking Billow force.
 (1656: ll. 196–203)

Denham’s fluent strategy allowed the 1656 version to read more “naturally and easily” so as to produce the illusion that Virgil wrote in English, or that Denham succeeded in “doing him more right,” making available in the most transparent way the foreign writer’s intention or the essential meaning of the foreign text. Yet Denham made available, not so much Virgil, as a translation that signified a peculiarly English meaning, and the revisions provide further evidence for this domestication. Thus the 1636 version translated “Teucrici” (l. 251) and “urbis” (l. 363) as “Trojans” and “Asias empresses,” whereas the 1656 version used just “The City” (ll. 243, 351), suggesting at once Troy and London. And whereas the 1636 version translated “sedes Priami” (l. 437) as “Priams pallace” and “domus interior” (l. 486) as “roome,” the 1656 version used “the Court” and “th’Inner Court” at these and other points (ll. 425, 438, 465, 473). Even “Apollinis infula” (l. 430), a reference to a headband worn by Roman priests, was more localized, turned into a reference to the episcopacy: in 1636, Denham rendered the phrase as “Apollos mitre,” in 1656 simply as “consecrated Mitre” (l. 416). The increased fluency of Denham’s revision may have made his translation seem “more right,” but this effect actually concealed a rewriting of the Latin text that endowed it with subtle allusions to English settings and institutions, strengthening the historical analogy between the fall of Troy and the defeat of the royalist party.

Fluency assumes a theory of language as communication that, in practice, manifests itself as a stress on immediate intelligibility and an avoidance of polysemy, or indeed any play of the signifier that erodes the coherence of the signified. Language is conceived as a transparent medium of personal expression, an individualism that construes translation as the recovery of the foreign writer’s intended meaning. As Denham’s preface asserted, “Speech is the apparel of our thoughts” (Denham 1656: A3^r). Now it will be worthwhile to recall the recurrent metaphors used in the translators’ prefaces, the analogy of translation as clothing in which the foreign author is dressed, or the translated text as the body animated by the foreign writer’s soul. The assumption is that meaning is a timeless and universal essence, easily transmittable between languages and cultures regardless of the change of signifiers, the construction of a different semantic context out of different cultural discourses, the inscription of translating-language codes and values in every interpretation of the foreign text. “W.L., Gent.” noted that his versions of Virgil’s eclogues involved their own violence against the foreign texts, “breaking the shell into many peeces,” but he was nonetheless “carefull to preserve the Kernell safe and whole, from the violence of a wrong, or wrested Interpretation.” Some translators gave more of a sense that they faced a welter of competing “Commentaries” (Wroth 1620) from which they selected to rationalize their translation strategy. But none was sufficiently aware of the domestication enacted by fluent translation to demystify the effect of transparency, to suspect that the translated text is irredeemably partial in its interpretation. Denham admitted that he was presenting a naturalized English Virgil, but he also insisted that “neither have I anywhere offered such violence to his sense, as to make it seem mine, and not his” (Denham 1656: A4^r).

Fluency can be seen as a discursive strategy ideally suited to domesticating translation, capable not only of executing the ethnocentric violence of domestication, but also of concealing this violence by producing the effect of transparency, the illusion that this is not a translation, but the foreign text, in fact, the living thoughts of the foreign author, “there being certain Graces and Happinesses peculiar to every Language, which gives life and energy to the words” (Denham 1656: A3^r). Transparency results in a concealment of the cultural and social conditions of the translation – the aesthetic, class, and nationalist ideologies linked to Denham’s translation theory and practice. And this is what makes fluent translation particularly effective in Denham’s bid to restore aristocratic culture to its dominant position: the effect of transparency is so powerful in domesticating cultural forms because it presents them as true, right, beautiful, natural. Denham’s great achievement, in his translations as well as his poems, was to make the heroic couplet seem natural to his successors, thus developing a form that would dominate English poetry and poetry translation for more than a century.

Later writers like John Dryden and Samuel Johnson recognized that the truly “new” thing in Denham was the stylistic refinement of his verse. They were fond of quoting Denham’s lines on the Thames in Coopers Hill and commenting on their beauty, always formulated as prosodic smoothness, what Dryden in the “Dedication of the Aeneis” (1697) called their “sweetness” (Dryden 1958: 1047).⁷ And both Dryden and Johnson saw Denham as an innovator in translation: they were also fond of quoting his commendatory verses to Fanshawe’s Il Pastor Fido, singling out for praise the lines where Denham advocated the free approach:

That servile path, thou nobly do’st decline,
Of tracing word by word and Line by Line;
A new and nobler way thou do’st pursue,
To make Translations, and Translators too:

They but preserve the Ashes, thou the Flame,
 True to his Sence, but truer to his Fame.
 (Denham 1969: ll. 15–16, 21–4)

Dryden joined Denham in opposing “a servile, literal Translation” because, he noted in his preface to Ovid’s Epistles (1680), such translation is not fluent: “either perspicuity or gracefulness will frequently be wanting” (Dryden 1956: 116).

Dryden also followed Denham, most importantly, in seeing the couplet as an appropriate vehicle for transparent discourse. In the preface to his play The Rival Ladies (1664), Dryden asserted that Coopers Hill, “for the majesty of the style is and ever will be, the exact standard of good writing” and then proceeded to argue that rhyme does not necessarily inject a note of artificiality to impede transparency (Dryden 1962: 7). Any noticeably artificial use of rhyme rather shows the writer’s lack of skill:

This is that which makes them say rhyme is not natural, it being only so when the poet either makes a vicious choice of words, or places them for rhyme sake, so unnaturally as no man would in ordinary speaking; but when ’tis so judiciously ordered that the first word in the verse seems to beget the second, and that the next [...] it must then be granted, rhyme has all the advantages of prose besides its own. [...] where the poet commonly confines his sense to his couplet, [he] must contrive that sense into such words that the rhyme shall naturally follow them, not they the rhymes.

(Dryden 1962: 8)

Denham’s work was canonized by later writers because his use of the couplet made his poetry and poetry translations read “naturally and easily” and therefore seem “majestic,” in an appropriately royal metaphor, or “more right,” more accurate or faithful as translations – but only because the illusion of transparency concealed the process of naturalizing the foreign text in an English cultural and social situation. The ascendancy of the heroic couplet from the late seventeenth century on has frequently been explained in political terms, wherein the couplet is viewed as a cultural form whose marked sense of antithesis and closure reflects a political conservatism, support for the restored monarchy and for aristocratic domination – despite the continuing class divisions that had erupted in civil wars and fragmented the aristocracy into factions, some more accepting of bourgeois social practices than others. Robin Grove is particularly sensitive to the social implications of the discursive “flow” sought by the writers who championed the couplet: “The urbanity of the style,” he observed, incorporates the reader as a member of the urbanely-responsive class. [...] literature announces itself as a social act, even as the “society” it conjures around it is an increasingly specialized/stratified fiction: a fiction which indeed relates to historical fact (provided we don’t just coagulate the two), but for whose purposes the ideas of Sense, Ease, Naturalness (cf. An Essay on Criticism, 68–140) contained a rich alluvial deposit of aspirations and meanings largely hidden from view.

(Grove 1984: 54)⁸

The fact that for us today no form better than the couplet epitomizes the artificial use of language bears witness, not just to how deeply transparency was engrained in aristocratic literary culture, but also to how much it could conceal.

It is Dryden in particular who found Denham's translation of Virgil so important for the rise of this cultural discourse. In the "Dedication of the Aeneis," he stated that "'tis the utmost of my Ambition to be thought [the] Equal" of Caroline translators like "Sir John Denham, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Cowley" (Dryden 1958: 1051). He admired Denham's version of book 2 so much that he absorbed no fewer than eighty lines of it in his own version of the Aeneid. A typical example is his rendering of the account of Priam's death, where, as Dryden acknowledged in a footnote, Denham's climactic line is repeated:

Thus Priam fell: and shar'd one common Fate
With Troy in Ashes, and his ruin'd State:
He, who the Scepter of all Asia sway'd,
Whom monarchs like domestick Slaves obey'd.
On the bleak Shoar now lies th'abandon'd King,
A headless Carcass, and a nameless thing.

(Dryden 1958: ll. 758–63)

Dryden's dedicatory essay makes clear his advocacy of Denham's free approach, which he similarly asserts with nationalistic pronouncements ("I will boldly own, that this English Translation has more of Virgil's Spirit in it, than either the French, or the Italian": ibid.: 1051) while finally confessing its likeness to French models:

I may presume to say, and I hope with as much reason as the French Translator, that taking all the Materials of this divine Author, I have endeavour'd to make Virgil speak such English, as he wou'd himself have spoken, if he had been born in England, and in this present Age. I acknowledge, with Segrais, that I have not succeeded in this attempt, according to my desire: yet I shall not be wholly without praise, if in some sort I may be allow'd to have copied the Clearness, the Purity, the Easiness and the Magnificence of his Stile.

As with Denham, the domestication of Dryden's translation practice is so complete that fluency is seen to be a feature of Virgil's poetry instead of the discursive strategy implemented by the translator to make the heroic couplet seem transparent, indistinguishable from "the Clearness, the Purity, the Easiness and the Magnificence of his Stile.” And, much more explicitly than Denham, Dryden links his fluent, domesticating translation to aristocratic culture. Thus he explains his avoidance of specialized terminology in his version of the Aeneid – “the proper terms of Navigation, Land-Service, or [...] the Cant of any Profession” – by arguing that Virgil has avoided those proprieties, because he Writ not to Mariners, Souldiers, Astronomers, Gardners, Peasants, &c. but to all in general, and in particular to Men and Ladies of the first Quality: who have been better Bred than to be too nicely knowing in the Terms. In such cases, 'tis enough for a Poet to write so plainly, that he may be understood by his Readers.

(Ibid.: 1061)

Dryden’s remark is a reminder that free translation was modelled on poetry, that Denham was using translation to distinguish a literary elite from “them who deal in matters of Fact, or matters of Faith” (Denham 1656: A3^r), and that this valorization of the literary contributed to the concealment of the cultural and social conditions of translation, including Dryden’s own. For, as Steven Zwicker has shown, Dryden also designed his Virgil to intervene into a specific political struggle: it “is a meditation on the language and culture of Virgil’s poetry, but it is also a set of reflections on English politics in the aftermath of the Glorious Revolution,” argued Zwicker, “a time when William III’s reign was not fixed with the certainty it assumed late in the decade, a time when Stuart restoration might still be contemplated, and not wholly as fantasy” (Zwicker 1984: 177). The triumph of the heroic couplet in late seventeenth-century poetic discourse depends to some extent on the triumph of a neoclassical translation practice in aristocratic literary culture, a practice whose greatest triumph is perhaps the discursive sleight of hand that masks the political interests it serves.

2 An English translation tradition

In Dryden’s wake, from Alexander Pope’s multi-volume Homer (1715–26) to Alexander Tytler’s systematic Essay on the Principles of Translation (1791), domestication dominated the theory and practice of English-language translation. It was allied to different social tendencies and made to support varying cultural and political functions. Pope’s Homer continued the refinement of a transparent poetic discourse in the heroic couplet, still a literary elitism among the hegemonic classes, dependent less on court patronage than on publishers with subscription lists that were now increasingly bourgeois as well as aristocratic. It became fashionable to subscribe to Pope’s translation: over 40 percent of the names on the lists for his Iliad were titled, and the MPs included both Tories and Whigs (Rogers 1978; Hodgart 1978; Speck 1982). The authority of fluent translating was so powerful that it could cross party lines. Pope described the privileged discourse in his preface:

It only remains to speak of the Versification. Homer (as has been said) is perpetually applying the Sound to the Sense, and varying it on every new Subject. This is indeed one of the most exquisite Beauties of Poetry, and attainable by very few: I know only of Homer eminent for it in the Greek, and Virgil in Latine. I am sensible it is what may sometimes happen by Chance, when a Writer is warm, and fully possess of his Image: however it may be reasonably believed they design'd this, in whose Verse it so manifestly appears in a superior degree to all others. Few Readers have the Ear to be Judges of it, but those who have will see I have endeavour'd at this Beauty.

Pope manifests the distinctive blind spot of domesticating translation, confusing, under the illusion of transparency, his interpretation of the foreign text with the text itself, even with the foreign writer's intention, canonizing classical writing on the basis of Enlightenment concepts of poetic discourse, a metrical facility designed to reduce the signifier to a coherent signified, "perpetually applying the Sound to the Sense." The fluency of Pope's Homer set the standard for verse translations of classical poetry, so that, as Penelope Wilson notes, we find the ancient poets emerging from the mill of decorum in more or less undifferentiated batches of smooth rhyme, or blank verse, and elegant diction. They are generally met by reviewers with correspondingly vague commendations such as "not less faithful than elegant"; and when they are condemned, they are more often condemned on stylistic grounds than on those of accuracy.

In the eighteenth century, stylistic elegance in a translation can already be seen as symptomatic of domestication, bringing the ancient text in line with literary standards prevailing in Hanoverian Britain.

During this crucial moment in its cultural rise, domesticating translation was sometimes taken to extremes that look at once oddly comical and rather familiar in their logic, practices a translator might use today in the continuing dominion of fluency. William Guthrie, for instance, in the preface to his version of The Orations of Marcus Tullius Cicero (1741), argued that "it is living Manners alone that can communicate the Spirit of an Original" and so it is sufficient if the translator has made it his Business to be as conversant as he cou'd in that Study and Manner which comes the nearest to what we may suppose his Author, were he now to live, wou'd pursue, and in which he wou'd shine.

(Steiner 1975: 98)

This was Guthrie's reason for casting his Cicero as a member of Parliament, "where," he says, "by a constant Attendance, in which I was indulg'd for several Years, I endeavour'd to possess my self of the Language most proper for this translation" (ibid.: 99). Guthrie's version naturalized the Latin text with the transparent discourse he developed as a reporter of parliamentary debates for the Gentleman's Magazine.

The dominance of domesticating translation extended to popular genres like the novel where it was practiced by translators from different classes, both men and women. Mary Mitchell Collyer, a London skinner's daughter who received a literary education, wrote prose fiction and translated from French and German to help maintain her family amid financial difficulties: as she put it in the dedication to her widely read version of Gessner's The Death of Abel (1761), "my cares and pleasures are concentrated within the narrow limits of my little family, and it is in order to contribute to the support and education of my children, I have taken up the pen" (Collyer 1761: iii; for her biography, see <http://www.geoffsgenealogy.co.uk>). Her 1742 version of Marivaux's La vie de Marianne assimilated the French text to current trends in the British novel, notably the moralistic sentimentalism exemplified by Richardson's Pamela: or, Virtue Rewarded (1740) (Collyer 1965: xxx–xxxii; Hughes 1917; Merrett 1990: 244–7). This move can be detected in her preface, where she tellingly described Marivaux's "history" as "a useful piece of instruction, a lesson of nature, a true and lively picture of the human heart," but she also decided to avoid a close rendering of the French title and instead devise one more suitable to a Richardsonian interpretation, The Virtuous Orphan (Collyer 1965: 5–6). Collyer's translation made substantial changes along these lines, deleting and revising passages to insure that no questions are raised about the title character's morality, inserting observations that reflect her own Shaftesburyan deism, going so far as to Anglicize the "curé de village" (village priest) as the "country vicar" and to add a description of his garden that evokes the landscaping advocated by Addison and Pope (Marivaux 1957: 14; Collyer 1965: xxi, 14, xxix; Merrett 1990: 247). And like most of her contemporaries Collyer prized fluent translating to such extent that she carefully reworked Marivaux's suggestive prose, producing a transparency that masked the values she inscribed in the French text.

Consider an excerpt from Marianne's portrait of Madame Dorsin whose salon she visits upon her arrival in Paris:

Quand quelqu'un a peu d'esprit et de sentiment, on dit d'ordinaire qu'il a les organes épais; et un de mes amis, à qui je demandai ce que cela signifiait, me dit gravement et en termes savants: C'est que notre âme est plus ou moins bornée, plus ou moins embarrassée, suivant la conformation des organes auxquels elle est unie.

Et s'il m'a dit vrai, il fallait que la nature eût donné à M^{me} Dorsin des organes bien favorables; car jamais âme ne fut plus agile que la sienne, et ne souffrit moins de diminution dans sa faculté de penser. La plupart des femmes qui ont beaucoup d'esprit ont une certaine façon d'en avoir qu'elles n'ont pas naturellement, mais qu'elles se donnent.

Celle-ci s'exprime nonchalamment et d'un air distrait afin qu'on croie qu'elle n'a presque pas besoin de prendre la peine de penser, et que tout ce qu'elle dit lui échappe.

C'est un air froid, sérieux et décisif que celle-là parle, et c'est pour avoir aussi un caractère d'esprit particulier.

Une autre s'adonne à ne dire que des choses fines, mais d'un ton qui est encore plus fin que tout ce qu'elle dit; une autre se met à être vive et pétillante. M^{me} Dorsin ne débitait rien de ce qu'elle disait dans aucune de ces petites manières de femme: c'était le caractère de ses pensées qui réglait bien franchement le ton dont elle parlait. Elle ne songeait à avoir aucune sorte d'esprit, mais elle avait l'esprit avec lequel on en a de toutes les sortes, suivant que le hasard des matières l'exige; et je crois que vous m'entendrez, si je vous dis qu'ordinairement son esprit n'avait point de sexe, et qu'en même temps ce devait être de tous les esprits de femme le plus aimable, quand M^{me} Dorsin voulait.

It is commonly thought that our souls are more capacious or narrow, more penetrating or confused and clouded, according to the configuration of the organs to which it is united. And, if this be true, nature must surely have given Mrs. Dorsin a most favourable organization, for never was a mind more active and sprightly, or more solid and judicious than hers.

Most women of wit have an unnatural and affected way of expressing it which renders it distasteful. One speaks in a careless, indifferent manner in order to make us think that her fine genius does not need the aid of reflection, and that all she says escapes her without thought. Another speaks with a cold, grave, and decisive tone, to give herself an air of importance. Another says only fine things, which she delivers in a manner finer still than all she says, and another will fall into a ridiculous gaiety and act the flirt. But Mrs. Dorsin never behaved with any of these little womanish arts. The subject of her discourse regulated the tone of her voice. She did not think she had any kind of wit, but she had that source from which it necessarily proceeds – a pleasing vivacity mixed with solidity and good sense, which was agreeably expressed according to the various exigencies that required it, for her understanding had no sex. It comprehended the strength, the solidity, the delicacy, the gaiety of both.

Collyer's choices are remarkable for their tendency not merely to make the French text more clear or explicit, but to develop and even exaggerate it while interpolating her own comments. She replaced the phrase "plus ou moins bornée, plus ou moins embarrassée” (more or less limited, more or less obstructed) with explanatory renderings: “more capacious or narrow, more penetrating or confused and clouded.” With “plus agile” (more nimble), however, she translated even more expansively: “more active and sprightly, or more solid and judicious.” Her use of the phrase “an unnatural and affected way” restated more plainly and pejoratively Marivaux’s mention of “une certaine façon [...] qu’elles n’ont pas naturellement, mais qu’elles se donnent” (a certain manner [...] which they do not naturally have, but which they give themselves). She inserted judgments that are either entirely absent from the French text (“which renders it distasteful,” “a pleasing vivacity mixed with solidity and good sense”) or draw an inference from it: “une autre se met à être vive et pétillante” (another woman sets about to be lively and sparkling) thus became “another will fall into a ridiculous gaiety and act the flirt.” She also quashed any doubt the reader might have about Madame Dorsin’s “understanding” by omitting Marivaux’s point that “de tous les esprits de femme” hers was “le plus aimable, quand M^{me} Dorsin voulait” (of all female minds hers was the kindest, when she wished) and adding the sweeping statement that “it comprehended the strength, the solidity, the delicacy, the gaiety of both [sexes].” Collyer’s choices shaped both characters, intensifying Marianne’s praiseworthy admiration for Madame Dorsin’s sensible and modest intelligence and enabling the younger woman to voice a protofeminist belief in gender equality – a belief supported by Collyer’s omission of Marivaux’s slyly ironic reference to the male friend (“un de mes amis,” “il”) who provided Marianne’s criteria for judging Madame Dorsin. At the same time, Collyer’s subtle transformations of the French text were elided by the sheer fluency of her translation: she lent her prose an easy readability through various stylistic moves, perhaps most effectively by maintaining a high degree of lexical precision and syntactic continuity (forming neatly balanced phrases and concise sentences, inserting connectives like “and” and “but”).

It is important not to view such instances of domestication as simply inaccurate translations. Canons of accuracy are always locally defined, specific to different cultural formations at different historical moments. During the early modern period, the firm distinctions that we draw today between original compositions, translations, and adaptations did not obtain. Translators deliberately resorted to rhetorical practices like amplification to develop aspects of the foreign text in accordance with the demands of form and theme (McMurran 2000). They recognized that a ratio of loss and gain inevitably occurs in the translation process and situates the translation in an equivocal relationship to the foreign text, never quite faithful, always somewhat free, never establishing an identity, always a lack and a supplement. Yet they also viewed their domesticating practice as the most effective way to control this equivocal relationship and produce versions adequate to the foreign text. As a result, they sometimes castigated strategies that either rigorously adhered to foreign-language textual features or played fast and loose with them in ways that they were unwilling to license, especially in cases where a translation insufficiently adhered to the canon of fluency. Dryden “thought it fit to steer betwixt the two Extreams, of Paraphrase, and literal Translation” (Dryden 1958: 1055), that is, between the aim of reproducing primarily the meanings of the Latin text, usually at the cost of its phonological and syntactical features, and the aim of rendering it word for word, respecting syntax and line break. And he distinguished his practice from Abraham Cowley’s “imitations” of Pindar, partial translations that revised and, in effect, abandoned the foreign text. Dryden felt it was Denham “who advis’d more Liberty than he took himself” (Dryden 1956: 117), permitting Denham’s substantial liberties – the editing of the Latin text, the English architectural lexicon – to pass unnoticed, refined out of existence, naturalized by the majesty of the style. The ethnocentric violence performed by domesticating translation rested on a double fidelity, to the foreign text as well as to the translating culture, and especially to its valorization of transparent discourse. But this was clearly impossible and knowingly duplicitous, accompanied by the rationale that a gain in English intelligibility, cultural force, or didactic function outweighed the loss suffered by the foreign text and culture.

This trend in English-language translation gets pushed to a new extreme at the end of the eighteenth century, in Alexander Fraser Tytler’s Essay on the Principles of Translation (1791). Tytler’s influential treatise is a key document in the canonization of fluency, a digest of its “principles,” “laws,” and “precepts” which offers a plethora of illustrative examples. His decisive consolidation of earlier statements, French as well as English, constituted a theoretical refinement, visible in the precision of his distinctions and in the philosophical sophistication of his assumptions: domestication is now recommended on the basis of a general human nature that is repeatedly contradicted by an aesthetic individualism.

For Tytler, the aim of translation is the production of an equivalent effect that transcends linguistic and cultural differences:

I would therefore describe a good translation to be, That, in which the merit of the original work is so completely transfused into another language, as to be as distinctly apprehended, and as strongly felt, by a native of the country to which that language belongs, as it is by those who speak the language of the original work.

(Tytler 1978: 15)

The “merit” of the foreign text, and the “excellencies and defects” of attempts to reproduce it in translation, are accessible to all, because, in so far as reason and good sense afford a criterion, the opinion of all intelligent readers will probably be uniform. But, as it is not to be denied, that in many of the examples adduced in this Essay, the appeal lies not so much to any settled canons of criticism, as to individual taste; it will not be surprising, if in such instances, a diversity of opinion should take place: and the Author having exercised with great freedom his own judgment in such points, it would ill become him to blame others for using the same freedom in dissenting from his opinions.

(Ibid.: vii–viii)

For Tytler, it is possible both to translate successfully and to evaluate translations because he assumes that linguistic and cultural differences do not exist at a fundamental level, invoking a universal “reason and good sense” that distinguishes a public sphere of cultural consensus (“readers”) but extends to the species, “intelligent” human beings.⁹ Yet he subsequently narrows this sphere, first excluding consensus (“settled canons of criticism”) and then appealing to the “freedom” of “individual taste.” Tytler’s “common sense” approach to translation rests on a liberal humanism that is stated with a fugitive democratic gesture (a public sphere of cultural debate), but lapses ultimately into an individualist aesthetics with skeptical consequences: “in matters where the ultimate appeal is to Taste, it is almost impossible to be secure of the solidity of our opinions, when the criterion of their truth is so very uncertain” (ibid.: 11).

The strain of individualism in Tytler’s treatise is so powerful, however “uncertain” the contours of subjectivity may seem, that he never shows the slightest skepticism about aesthetic judgment and in fact constructs a concept of “correct taste” based on “exquisite feeling.” The translator’s every choice should be governed by it – even to the point of violating the “laws” for good translation. These include, first, “That the Translation should give a complete transcript of the ideas of the original work,” and, second, “That the style and manner of writing should be of the same character with that of the original” (Tytler 1978: 16). The “man of exquisite feeling,” however, is invested with the “liberty” of “adding to or retrenching the ideas of the original,” as well as the “privilege” of “correcting what appears to him a careless or inaccurate expression of the original, where that inaccuracy seems materially to affect the sense” (ibid.: 54). Of course, what is “correct” is always a value in the receiving situation, including the discursive effect that dominates English culture at that moment, transparency. Hence, Tytler’s third and final “law” is “That the Translation should have all the ease of original composition” (ibid.: 15).

Good translators implement fluent strategies: they avoid syntactical fragmentation, polysemy (“which, by the bye, is always a defect in composition” [Tytler 1978: 28]), sudden shifts in register. Tytler praises Henry Steuart, “Esq.,” “the ingenious translator of Sallust,” for his “version of a most difficult author, into easy, pure, correct, and often most eloquent language”; Steuart recognized “the fruitlessness of any attempt to imitate the abrupt and sententious manner” of the Latin text (ibid.: 188–9). Of Arthur Murphy’s Tacitus, Tytler remarks, “We most admire the judgment of the translator in forbearing all attempt to rival the brevity of the original, since he knew it could not be attained but with the sacrifice both of ease and perspicuity” (ibid.: 186–7). “To imitate the obscurity or ambiguity of the original, is a fault; and it is still a greater, to give more than one meaning” (ibid.: 28–9). Thomas May and George Sandys “manifested a better taste in poetical translation” because they “have given to their versions [of Lucan and Ovid] both an ease of expression and a harmony of numbers, which make them approach very near to original composition,” masking both the second-order status of the translation and its domestication of the foreign text. For these translators who produced the sense of originality “have everywhere adapted their expression to the idiom of the language in which they wrote” (ibid.: 68). The governing “precept,” Tytler states, is “That the translator ought always to figure to himself, in what manner the original author would have expressed himself, if he had written in the language of the translation” (ibid.: 201). But the translator must also conceal the figural status of the translation, indeed confuse the domesticated figure with the foreign writer.

Tytler’s recommendations of fluency lead to the inscription of the foreign text with a rather conservative set of social representations. These include a squeamishness about physical references that enables his concept of “correct taste” to function as a cultural discourse by which the bourgeoisie and a bourgeois aristocracy express their superiority to lower classes. As Peter Stallybrass and Allon White have shown, within the symbolic discourse of the bourgeoisie, illness, disease, poverty, sexuality, blasphemy and the lower classes were inextricably connected. The control of the boundaries of the body (in breathing, eating, defecating) secured an identity which was constantly played out in terms of class difference.

(Stallybrass and White 1986: 167)

Thus Tytler finds that Homer betrays a tendency “to offend, by introducing low images and puerile allusions. Yet how admirably is this defect veiled over, or altogether removed, by his translator Pope” (Tytler 1978: 79). Pope is praised for omitting “an impropriety,” Homer’s “compliment to the nurse’s waist” – in Tytler’s translation, her “waist was elegantly girt” – as well as “one circumstance extremely mean, and even disgusting,” a “nauseous image” of Achilles as a child: in Tytler’s translation, “When I placed you on my knees, I filled you full with meat minced down, and gave you wine, which you vomited upon my bosom” (ibid.: 49–50, 89–90). At other points, the process of domestication is explicitly class-coded, with the translator advised to inscribe the foreign text with elite literary discourses while excluding discourses that circulate among an urban proletariat:

If we are thus justly offended at hearing Virgil speak in the style of the Evening Post or the Daily Advertiser, what must we think of the translator, who makes the solemn and sententious Tacitus express himself in the low cant of the streets, or in the dialect of the waiters of a tavern?

(Ibid.: 119)

Transparency, the “ease of original composition” in translation, was a genteel literary effect that avoided the “licentiousness” of popular oral genres:

The most correct taste is requisite to prevent that ease from degenerating into licentiousness. [...] The most licentious of all translators was Mr Thomas Brown, of facetious memory, in whose translations from Lucian we have the most perfect ease; but it is the ease of Billingsgate and of Wapping.

(Ibid.: 220–1)

Ultimately, Tytler’s bourgeois valorization of transparent discourse to the exclusion of what Mikhail Bakhtin called the “carnavalesque” reveals a class anxiety about the simulacral status of the translated text and the threat it poses to an individualistic concept of authorship (Bakhtin 1984). Stallybrass and White facilitate this critique of Tytler’s translation theory with their Bakhtinian history of the construction of authorship in England:

Jonson, Dryden, Pope and Wordsworth each sought to legitimate his claim to the vocation of master-poet by disengaging himself from the carnivalesque scene so as to stand above it, taking up a singular position of transcendence. The traces of this labour, of this act of discursive rejection, are marked out by nothing so much as the poet’s attempt to found an illusory unity above and beyond the carnival. In each case, however, this apparently simple gesture of social superiority and disdain could not be effectively accomplished without revealing the very labour of suppression and sublimation involved.

Translation threatens the transcendental author because it submits his text to the infiltration of other discourses that are not bourgeois, individualistic, transparent. In Tytler’s case, there is a special concern that classical texts should not be carnivalized and degraded by translation strategies that do not implement canonical readings of those texts – colloquializing “the solemn and sententious Tacitus,” for example, or trashing the “strength united with simplicity” that is “characteristic of the language of Homer” by rendering his vulgarities. The very labour of suppression and sublimation involved in Tytler’s theory can be glimpsed in his willingness to risk compromising the canonicity of classical texts, admitting that they must be edited to fit his chastening, bourgeois readings of them. Insofar as Tytler’s neoclassicism comprehends free translation, it at once expresses and declares impossible a nostalgic dream of originality, the ancients’ proximity to “Nature,” representation and expression free of their discursive conditions.

For Tytler, the threat posed by translation to the author’s transcendence is answered by liberal humanism, the contradiction between a general human nature and the individualist aesthetics embodied in the concept of “correct taste.” His explicit intention is to address “the subject of translation considered as an art, depending on fixed principles” (Tytler 1978: 4; my italics). The translator with “correct taste” is in fact an artist, an author: “none but a poet can translate a poet” (ibid.: 208); “an ordinary translator sinks under the energy of his original; the man of genius frequently rises above it” (ibid.: 42). And it is transparency that signifies the translator’s authorship in the text: the ease of originality occurs in “specimens of perfect translation, where the authors have entered with exquisite taste into the manner of their originals” (ibid.: 142). The translator’s authorship hinges on a sympathetic identification with the foreign author – “to use a bold expression, [the translator] must adopt the very soul of his author, which must speak through his own organs” (ibid.: 212) – but in the translation what gets expressed is less the foreign author’s “soul” than the translator’s: “With what superior taste has the translator heightened this simile, and exchanged the offending circumstance for a beauty”; “in such instances, the good taste of the translator invariably covers the defect of the original” (ibid.: 89, 88). The anxiety that translation complicates authorial self-expression by mediating the foreign text with “low” discourses is allayed by Tytler’s erasure of the distinction between translator and author, largely on the basis of an illusionistic effect of textuality, now the sign of “correct taste.”

Tytler (1747–1813), a Scottish lord who practiced law and pursued various historical, literary, and philosophical interests, published his treatise anonymously in 1791 and then issued two more editions, in 1797 and 1813, expanding the book to more than three times its initial size by adding many, many examples, driven by the empiricist conviction that they would make his concept of “taste” seem true, right, obvious. The treatise was very favorably received by reviewers and readers, confirming Tytler’s sense that he was addressing a public sphere of cultural consensus, even if that sphere was limited to a like-minded bourgeois literary elite.¹⁰ The European Magazine, which announced itself as “a general Vehicle, by which the literati of the Whole Kingdom may converse with each other and communicate their Knowledge to the World,” concluded its review “with wonder at the variety of our Author’s reading, with praise of the justness of his judgment and the elegance of his taste” (European Magazine 1793: 282). Tytler’s treatise prompted the Monthly Review to reflect on “the gradual progress of taste among our English writers” as evidenced in the rise of fluent translation (Monthly Review 1792: 361). The anonymous reviewer asserted that “the author’s observations are, for the most part, so evidently dictated by good sense, and so consonant to correct taste, as to admit of little dispute; and the examples, by which they are illustrated, are very judiciously selected and properly applied,” “sufficient to convince every reader of good taste, that the volume will repay the trouble of a diligent perusal of the whole” (ibid.: 363, 366).

Although both of these reviewers expressed some doubts about Tytler’s recommendation that the translator edit or “improve” the foreign text, neither found this editing questionable because of the domestication it involved. On the contrary, the question was the specific nature of the domestication, with both offering reasons firmly based on translation agendas in the receiving culture. The reviewer for the Monthly Review suggested that Tytler’s “improvements” of the foreign text might interfere with the improvement of taste performed by translation, “the great end of which undoubtedly is to give the unlearned reader a correct idea of the merit of the original” (Monthly Review 1792: 363). The reviewer for the European Magazine was less didactic but equally snobbish in his wish to preserve the classical text in a pure, unmediated state: “Such ornaments appear to us like modern gilding laid upon one of the finest statues of antiquity” (European Magazine 1792: 188). This antiquarianism, although based on an idealized concept of the past, was actually serving contemporary social interests, laboring, somewhat contradictorily, under the valorization of transparent discourse in elite literary culture, recommending translations that seem to reproduce the foreign text perfectly: “the sober sense of criticism [...] bids a translator to be the faithful mirror of his original” (ibid.: 189).

Tytler’s importance in the canonization of fluent translation is perhaps most clearly indicated by George Campbell’s adherence to the same “principles” in his two-volume version of the Gospels. Campbell’s was undoubtedly one of the most popular English translations of its time: between 1789, when it was first issued, and 1834, fifteen editions appeared in Britain and the United States. The massive first volume contained Campbell’s “Preliminary Dissertations” on such issues as “The chief Things to be attended to in translating” (“Dissertation the Tenth,” 445–519). The closeness to Tytler’s recommendations is remarkable:

The first thing, without doubt, which claims [the translator’s] attention, is to give a just representation of the sense of the original. This, it must be acknowledged, is the most essential of all. The second thing is, to convey into his version, as much as possible, in a consistency with the genius of the language which he writes, the author’s spirit and manner, and, if I may so express myself, the very character of his style. The third and last thing is, to take care, that the version have at least, so far the quality of an original performance, as to appear natural and easy, such as shall give no handle to the critic to charge the translator with applying words improperly, or in a meaning not warranted by use, or combining them in a way which renders the sense obscure, and the construction ungrammatical, or even harsh.

To recommend transparency as the most suitable discourse for the Gospels was indeed to canonize fluent translation. Tytler, who claimed not to know of Campbell’s work before publishing his own, made use of it in later editions of the Essay, drawing on the “Preliminary Dissertations” for additional examples and joining Campbell in rejecting translations that were either too literal or too free, that deviated too far from fluency and from dominant interpretations of the sacred text. “Dr. Campbell has justly remarked, that the Hebrew is a simple tongue,” observed Tytler, agreeing with the Bible translator’s rejection of Sebastianus Castalio’s version for its “elegant Latinity,” for “substituting the complex and florid composition to the simple and unadorned” (Tytler 1978: 111, 112).

Campbell's description of his own discursive strategy recommended fluency: "As to the Language, particularly of the version itself, simplicity, propriety, and perspicuity, are the principal qualities at which I have aimed. I have endeavoured to keep equally clear of the frippery of Arias, and the finery of Castalio" (Campbell 1789: xx). In Campbell's view, Arias Montanus erred because his Latin version "appears to have been servilely literal," offering obscure etymological renderings and "preserving uniformity, rendering the same word in the original, wherever it occurs, or however it is connected, by the same word in the version" without "attending to the scope of the author, as discovered by the context" (ibid.: 449, 450, 451). Fluency requires the translator's lexicon to be varied enough not to call attention to itself as a lexicon, to the artificiality of the translation, or ultimately to the fact that the translator has created a translating-language "context" to support his estimation of "the scope of the author."

Campbell's condemnation of close translation is a sharp reminder that any advocacy of transparent discourse conceals an investment in receiving cultural values – in his case, a Christian dogmatism with anti-Semitic overtones:

A slavish attachment to the letter, in translating, is originally the offspring of the superstition, not of the Church, but of the synagogue, where it would have been more suitable in Christian interpreters, the ministers, not of the letter, but of the spirit, to have allowed it to remain.

(Campbell 1789: 456–7)

Like Tytler, however, Campbell also assumed the existence of a public sphere governed by universal reason. In an exchange of letters, Campbell took the self-congratulatory view that the similarity of their ideas constituted "evidence" for "a concurrence in sentiment upon critical subjects with persons of distinguished ingenuity and erudition" (Alison 1818: 27). Yet the elite and exclusionary nature of this cultural consensus becomes evident, not merely in Campbell's Christian dogmatism, but also in his initial reaction to Tytler's treatise: Campbell wrote to the publisher to learn the author's name because, although he was "flattered not a little to think, that he had in these points the concurrence in judgment of a writer so ingenious," he nonetheless voiced "his suspicion, that the author might have borrowed from his Dissertation, without acknowledging the obligation" (Alison 1818: 27; Tytler 1978: xxxii). Campbell too was a translator with a sense of authorship – at once Christian and individualistic – that could be ruffled by other translations and translation discourses, provoking him to reactions that ran counter to his humanist assumptions.

By the turn of the nineteenth century, a translation practice of eliding the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text was firmly entrenched as a canon in English-language translation, always linked to a valorization of transparent discourse. The canonicity of domesticating translation was so far beyond question that it survived the disintegration of the bourgeois public sphere, "now much less one of bland consensus than of ferocious contention," in which English literary periodicals constituted cultural factions with explicit political positions (Eagleton 1984: 37). In 1820, John Hookham Frere, who would later publish his own translations of Aristophanes, unfavorably reviewed Thomas Mitchell's versions of The Acharnians and The Knights in the staunchly conservative Quarterly Review, Tory defender of neoclassical literary theory and the traditional authority of aristocracy and the Anglican Church (Sullivan 1983b: 359–67). For Frere, the principal “defect” of Mitchell's translation was that it cultivated an archaic dramatic discourse, “the style of our ancient comedy in the beginning of the 16th century,” whereas the language of translation ought, we think, as far as possible, to be a pure, impalpable and invisible element, the medium of thought and feeling, and nothing more; it ought never to attract attention to itself; hence all phrases that are remarkable in themselves, either as old or new; all importations from foreign languages and quotations, are as far as possible to be avoided. [...] such phrases as [Mitchell] has sometimes admitted, ‘solus cum solo,’ for instance, ‘petits pates,’ &c. have the immediate effect of reminding the reader, that he is reading a translation, and [...] the illusion of originality, which the spirited or natural turn of a sentence immediately preceding might have excited, is instantly dissipated by it.

Frere advocated the now familiar fluent strategy, in which the language of the translation is made to read with a “spirited or natural turn,” so that the absence of any syntactical and lexical peculiarities produces the “illusion” that the translation is not a translation, but the foreign text, reflecting the foreign writer's intention: “It is the office, we presume, of the Translator to represent the forms of language according to the intention with which they are employed” (ibid.: 482). The reviewer for the Edinburgh Review, a magazine whose liberal, Whiggish politics called the Quarterly Review into existence, nonetheless agreed that Mitchell's Aristophanes was defective, and for the same reason: he “devoted too much time to working in the mines of our early dramatists, instead of undergoing the greater trouble it would have cost him to form a style of his own more suited to the exigency” (Edinburgh Review 1820: 306).¹¹ The reviewer defined this “exigency” in terms of the stylistic feature repeatedly attributed to classical texts throughout the eighteenth century, asserting that “simplicity should never be forgotten in a translation of Aristophanes” (ibid.: 307). Yet the reviewer also suggested that the simplicity should be considered a feature of Mitchell's style as well (“a style of his own”), showing unwittingly that fluent translation domesticates the foreign text, making it intelligible in an English-language culture that values easy readability, transparent discourse, the illusion of authorial presence.

Once again, the domestication enacted by a fluent strategy was not seen as producing an inaccurate translation. The usually contentious periodicals agreed that William Stewart Rose's 1823 version of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso was both fluent and faithful. Blackwood's, a magazine that pursued Tory conservatism to reactionary extremes, called Rose's translation "a work which, of necessity, addresses itself to the more refined classes," since "never was such scrupulous fidelity of rendering associated with such light dancing elegance of language" (Blackwood's 1823: 30).¹² The London Magazine, which sought to maintain an independent neutrality amid its politically factious competitors, similarly found that Rose "generally combined the garrulous ease and unpremeditated manner of the original with a terse and equable flow of numbers" (London Magazine 1824: 626; Sullivan 1983b: 288–96). The Quarterly Review took Rose's version as an opportunity to restate the canons of fluent translation:

the two characteristics of a good translation are, that it should be faithful, and that it should be unconstrained. Faithful, as well in rendering correctly the meaning of the original, as in exhibiting the general spirit which pervades it: unconstrained, so as not to betray by its phraseology, by the collocation of its words, or construction of its sentences that it is only a copy.

(Quarterly Review 1823: 53)

A fluent strategy can be associated with fidelity because the effect of transparency conceals the translator's interpretation of the foreign text, the semantic context he has constructed in the translation according to receiving cultural values. Rose's fluent translation was praised for "rendering correctly the meaning of the original" because it assimilated the Italian text to English values, not only the valorization of "unconstrained" language, but also the interpretation of Ariosto's poem that currently prevailed in the receiving culture. And, once again, the dominion of fluency entailed that canonical texts, the ancient and modern texts in which the sense of original authorship was felt to be most pronounced, would possess stylistic simplicity. The reviewer for the London Magazine declared that Orlando Furioso is characterized by "this exquisite simplicity; which bears the distinctive mark of a superior genius" (London Magazine 1824: 626).

In Frere's case, fluency meant a linguistic homogenization that avoided, not merely archaism, but "associations exclusively belonging to modern manners," generalizing the foreign text by removing as many of the historically specific markers as possible. The translator must, if he is capable of executing his task upon a philosophic principle, endeavour to resolve the personal and local allusions into the genera, of which the local or personal variety employed by the original author, is merely the accidental type; and to reproduce them in one of those permanent forms which are connected with the universal and immutable habits of mankind.

Frere rationalized these admitted "liberties" by appealing to a "philosophic principle":

The proper domain of the Translator is, we conceive, to be found in that vast mass of feeling, passion, interest, action and habit which is common to mankind in all countries and in all ages; and which, in all languages, is invested with its appropriate forms of expression, capable of representing it in all its infinite varieties, in all the permanent distinctions of age, profession and temperament.

(Ibid.: 481)

For Frere, a fluent strategy enables the translation to be a transparent representation of the eternal human verities expressed by the foreign author.

The principle on which Frere's theory rests is the principle that can now be recognized as central to the history of fluent translation: liberal humanism, subjectivity seen as at once self-determining and determined by human nature, individualistic yet generic, transcending cultural difference, social conflict, and historical change to represent "every shade of the human character" (Frere 1820: 481). And, like preceding versions of this principle, Frere's may appear to be democratic in its appeal to what is "common to mankind," to a timeless and universal human essence, but it actually involved an insidious domestication that allowed him to imprint the foreign text with his conservative sexual morality and cultural elitism. He made plain his squeamishness about the physical coarseness of Aristophanic humor, its grotesque realism, and felt the need to explain it away as inconsistent with the author's intention: the "lines of extreme grossness" were "forced compromises," "which have evidently been inserted, for the purpose of pacifying the vulgar part of the audience, during passages in which their anger, or impatience, or disappointment, was likely to break out" (ibid.: 491). Hence, "in discarding such passages," Frere asserted, "the translator is merely doing that for his author, which he would willingly have done for himself" – were he not "often under the necessity of addressing himself exclusively to the lower class" (ibid.: 491). Frere's advocacy of a fluent strategy was premised on a bourgeois snobbery, in which the moral and political conservatism now ascendant in English culture resulted in a call for a bowdlerized Aristophanes that represented the "permanent" class divisions of humanity, what Frere described as "that true comic humour which he was directing to the more refined and intelligent part of his audience" (ibid.: 491). In Frere's view, "the persons of taste and judgment, to whom the author occasionally appeals, form, in modern times, the tribunal to which his translator must address himself" (ibid.: 491).

The Edinburgh Review criticized Mitchell's Aristophanes on the basis of similar philosophical and political assumptions, although formulated with an explicitly "liberal" difference. The reviewer's Aristophanes approached his audience with a democratic inclusiveness – "The smiles of the polite few were not enough for the comedian, – he must join them to the shouts of the million" – and since "for all tastes he had to cater," the playwright came to assume several social functions, "Public Satirist," "State Journalist," "Periodical Critic" (Edinburgh Review 1820: 280) – an Aristophanes modelled on the Edinburgh's own self-image as a liberal magazine. Unlike Frere, this reviewer sighs with relief that Mitchell “does not mean to publish a Family Aristophanes,” alluding to the title of Thomas Bowdler’s expurgated edition of Shakespeare (1818), and no offense was taken at Mitchell’s language. The problem for the Edinburgh reviewer was rather Mitchell’s description of Aristophanes’ “audience as usually made up of a mere ‘rabble,’ ripe for nothing but ‘the nonsense of holiday revelry,’ and totally unfit to appreciate merit of an higher order” (Edinburgh Review 1820: 275). Here the reviewer’s “liberal” stance reveals the same contradiction between humanism and cultural elitism that emerged in Frere: Aristophanic comedy “could not be altogether without attractions for the philosophic mind, that explores the principles of human nature, or the cultivated taste, that delights in the triumph of genius” (ibid.: 277). Not unexpectedly, the “qualities” that distinguish Aristophanes as “somewhat above the coarse apprehension of a mere mob, and fit to gain applause more precious than the unintellectual roar of plebeian acclamation,” are characteristic of transparent discourse: “both clear and perspicuous, – terse and yet magnificent, – powerful and ethical,” “that unfailing fluency and copiousness” (ibid.: 278, 282).

3 Two versions of Catullus

The canonization of fluency in English-language translation during the early modern period limited the translator’s options and defined their cultural and political stakes. A translator could choose the now traditional domesticating practice, an ethnocentric reduction of the foreign text to dominant cultural values in English; or a translator could choose a foreignizing practice, an ethnodeviant pressure on those values to register the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text. Around the start of the nineteenth century, the values in question, although stated somewhat contradictorily in various treatises, translators’ prefaces, and reviews, were decidedly bourgeois – liberal and humanist, individualistic and elitist, morally conservative and physically squeamish. The ways in which they constrained the translator’s activity, the forms of submission and resistance that a translator might adopt under their domination, become strikingly evident with the first book-length translations of Catullus into English, the versions of Dr John Nott (1795) and the Honourable George Lamb (1821).

Before these translations appeared, Catullus had long occupied a foothold in the canon of classical literature in English. Editions of the Latin texts were available on the Continent after the fifteenth century, and even though two more centuries passed before it was published in England, Catullus had already been imitated by a wide range of English poets – Thomas Campion, Ben Jonson, Edmund Waller, Robert Herrick, among many others (McPeck 1939; Wiseman 1985: chap. 7). Still, Catullus’s place in English literary culture, even if supported by such culturally prominent writers, was rather minor. There were few translations, usually of the same small group of kiss and sparrow poems, showing quite clearly that he was virtually neglected by English translators in favor of Homer, Virgil, Ovid, Horace: these were the major figures, translated in the service of diverse aesthetic, moral, and political interests. Catullus's marginality was partly an issue of genre, with epic privileged over lyric in English poetry translation during this period. But there was also the issue of morality, with English writers at once attracted and disturbed by the pagan sexuality and the physically coarse language, entertaining a guilty fixation on the poet's scandalous affair with "Lesbia."

The first substantial selected translation, the anonymous Adventures of Catullus, and History of His Amours with Lesbia (1707), was itself a translation from the French, Jean de la Chapelle's Les Amours de Catulle. It consisted of several narrative sections, some in the voices of Catullus and Lesbia, punctuated by versions of the Latin texts, all arranged to support "a train of Historical Conjectures [which] have so great a foundation in the poet's own Verses" (The Adventures of Catullus 1707: A2^v). For the English editor, the book was didactic, "one of the severest Lessons against our Passions and Vices"; but since it was described as "a just Representation of the Nobility of Antient Rome, in a private Life, in their Friendships, Conversation, and Manners within Doors," the editor was also assimilating Roman aristocratic culture to bourgeois values like emotional intimacy and moral propriety and perhaps questioning the "private life" of the British aristocracy: the book was dedicated to the Earl of Thomond (ibid.: A2^v–A3^v). In his Lives of the Roman Poets (1733), Lewis Crusius, anxiously feeling the need for a "justification of this Writer [who] has been very much censured for the Lewdness of some of his Pieces," asked the English reader to respect the historical and cultural differences of Catullus's poetry, its different sexual morality:

We would not be understood by any means to vindicate this conduct in our Author, but barely to shew, that Obscenity, according to the Antients, was not only allowable in these sorts of Compositions, but when artfully drest up, was esteemed one of its greatest beauties.

(Crusius 1733: 28)

In the end, however, Crusius bared only his moral refinement, concluding that the Latin texts should continue to be censored:

Many things more might be brought to shew the allowableness of this practice among the Greeks as well as Romans but as we think it in the highest degree criminal and offensive in itself, and of most pernicious consequence to the Readers, especially the youth of both sexes, into whose hands such pieces may happen to fall, we shall say no more on this Head.

(Ibid.: 29)

The appearance of two complete translations of Catullus's poetry within roughly a generation signalled a revision of the classical canon in English, the emergence of a new taste for short poems, mainly epigrams and lyrics, and especially those of an erotic nature. The cultural and social factors that made this revision possible included, not any relaxation of bourgeois moral norms, but the canonization of transparency in English poetry and poetry translation. Crusius had sounded this note early when he praised the “easy unaffected elegance and pleasantry that enlivens this Poet’s Style” (Crusius 1733: 28). By the beginning of the nineteenth century, Catullus’s poetry was routinely assimilated to transparent discourse, considered to offer an especially strong effect of authorial presence, and this occasionally weakened the critics’ prudery, leading them to mitigate the coarse language they found so offensive. The work of rehabilitation was evident in Charles Abraham Elton’s Specimens of the Classic Poets (1814), a three-volume anthology of verse translations from Greek and Latin. Elton felt that Catullus’s poetry was rather thin – “pieces of gallantry or satirical epigrams, with a few poems of a more elevated cast” – but he excused this defect by assuming that “much of the poetry of Catullus appears to have been lost” (Elton 1814: i, 30–1). What recommends the extant texts is their “ease” and “simplicity”:

They, who turn with disgust from the coarse impurities that sully his pages, may be inclined to wonder, that the term of delicacy should ever have been coupled with the name of Catullus. But to many of his effusions, distinguished both by fancy and feeling, this praise is justly due. Many of his amatory trifles are quite unrivalled in the elegance of their playfulness; and no author has excelled him in the purity and neatness of his style, the delightful ease and racy simplicity of his manner, and his graceful turns of thought and happinesses of expression. Some of his pieces, which breathe the higher enthusiasm of the art, and are coloured with a singular picturesqueness of imagery, increase our regret at the manifest mutilation of his works.

In 1818, Blackwood’s published an essay that remarked on the fluency of Catullus’s verse, finding it a mirror of the poet: “This language is uniformly unlaboured. [...] His versification is careless, but graceful. His feeling is weak, but always true. The poet has no inclination to appear any thing but what he is” (Blackwood’s 1818: 487). The essayist then ventured to connect Catullus to a canonical English figure, suggesting that the “obscenity is seldom introduced altogether for its own sake. Like that of Swift, it is only the weapon of satire” (ibid.: 488). The final verdict, however, was that it is quite impossible to read his verses without regretting that he happened to be an idler, a man of fashion, and a debauchee. [...] he might have bequeathed to posterity works fitted to inspire sentiments of virtue and morality, instead of a book, the greater part of which must for ever remain sealed to all those who have any principle of human delicacy in their composition.

(Ibid.: 489)

The translators of the first book-length versions of Catullus, Nott and Lamb, shared the prevailing assessment of the Latin poet, but it shaped their work very differently. Nott too thought that “strength and simplicity, elegance and perspicuity mark the stile of Catullus” (Nott 1795: I, xxiii), while Lamb wrote of “the poet’s natural felicity of expression,” “the same natural tone which Catullus rarely or rather never lost” (Lamb 1821: I, xl, xlii). The most remarkable difference between the translators occurred on the question of morality: Nott sought to reproduce the pagan sexuality and physically coarse language of the Latin text, whereas Lamb minimized or just omitted them.

Nott was aware that “Those indecencies occurring so frequently in our poet, which I have constantly preserved in the original, and ventured in some way to translate, may be thought to require apology” (Nott 1795: I, x). His initial reason – to satisfy “the inquisitive scholar [who] might wish to be acquainted with the ribaldry, and gross lampoon of Roman times” (ibid.) – would not be persuasive to his contemporaries, since such a reader already had access to the Latin text; perhaps the claim should be viewed less as a rationale than as a reflection of Nott’s own scholarly bent, his wish to address an academic audience. His main concern seems to have been twofold: to ward against an ethnocentric response to the Latin text and to signal its historical and cultural differences:

When an ancient classic is translated, and explained, the work may be considered as forming a link in the chain of history: history should not be falsified, we ought therefore to translate him fairly; and when he gives us the manners of his own day, however disgusting to our sensations, and repugnant to our natures they may sometimes prove, we must not endeavour to conceal, or gloss them over, through a fastidious regard to delicacy.

Nott’s sense of historical accuracy assumed a mimetic concept of translation as a representation adequate to the foreign text. In 1795, this mimetic assumption was beginning to seem dated in English poetic theory, a throwback to an older empiricism, challenged now by expressive theories of poetry and original genius (see Abrams 1953; Foucault 1970). And yet Nott’s adherence to a residual theoretical assumption enabled him to resist the pressure of bourgeois moral values on his translation.

In 1821, Lamb possessed a more contemporary, romantic sense of authorial authenticity that projected an expressive concept of translation as adequately communicating the foreign author’s psychological state. Catullus’s “compositions, few as they are, probably express his feelings upon every important event of his short career,” Lamb believed, and this led him to conclude that the Latin poet “seems to have been as little sullied by the grossness of the age, as was possible [...] pure indeed must that mind naturally have been, which, amidst such coarseness of manners, could preserve so much expressive delicacy and elevated refinement” (Lamb 1821: I, xlii–xliii). Lamb’s expressive poetics underwrote not only his belief in the poet's purity, both moral and stylistic, but also his advocacy of a free approach that effected the illusion of transparency while domesticating the Latin text. Explicitly situating himself in the main tradition of fluent translation from Denham to Johnson, Lamb stated that "the natural course of translation is, first to secure its fidelity, and then to attempt the polish of elegance and freedom" (ibid.: lviii). Hence, he handled the "objectionable expressions" by developing strategies of "omission and amplification," recognizing "the necessity of making every attempt to veil and soften before entire omission could be justified," revising on the assumption that Catullus was "a genius originally pure, however polluted by the immorality of its era" (ibid.: lix, xli).

Lamb's translation submitted to the bourgeois values that dominated English culture, inscribing the Latin text with a conservative morality and a fetish for transparent poetic discourse. Nott worked under the same cultural regime, but he rather chose to resist those values in the name of preserving the differences of the Latin text. Nott foreignized Catullus, although foreignization does not mean that he somehow transcended his own historical moment to reproduce the foreign, unmediated by the receiving situation. On the contrary, if Nott's translation presented any element of Roman culture during the late Republic, it could only be in English-language cultural terms, making the foreign here not so much "Roman" as a marked deviation from current English values.

The various aspects of Nott's foreignized Catullus stand out conspicuously against Lamb's domestication. Nott's bilingual edition, intended to give "the whole of Catullus without reserve" (Nott 1795: I, x), consisted of 115 poems attributed to the Latin poet; Lamb's English-only edition included 84 (Lamb 1821). Nott translated texts that referred to adulterous affairs and homosexual relationships, as well as texts that contained descriptions of sexual acts, especially anal and oral intercourse. Lamb either omitted or bowdlerized them, preferring more refined expressions of heterosexual love that glanced fleetingly at sexual activity. Catullus's satiric epigram on the "Verbenni," for instance, is a poem that Lamb excluded. Here is the Latin text with Nott's translation:

O furum optime balneariorum
Vibenni pater et cinaede fili, (nam dextra pater inquinatiore, culo filius est voraciore) cur non exilium malasque in oras itis? quandoquidem patris rapinae notae sunt populo, et natis pilosas, fili, non potes asse venditare.

Old Vibennius of all your bath-rogues is the first;
Nor less noted his boy for unnatural lust:
The hands of the former are ever rapacious,
The latter's posterior is full as voracious:

Then, o why don't ye both into banishment go,
 And deservedly wander in deserts of woe?
 Not a soul but the father's mean rapines must tell;
 And thou, son, canst no longer thy hairy breech sell.

(Nott 1795: I, 90–1)

Nott's translation deviated from English literary and moral values in several ways. Not only did he choose to include the Latin text and translate the sexual references, but his choices ("unnatural lust," "posterior," "breech") render the Latin quite closely ("cinaede," "culo," "natis"), refusing the traditional free approach and thus avoiding euphemism and expurgation. Nott's translation is equally un-English in being no more than intermittently fluent. The text opens with a false rhyme ("first"/"lust"). The twelve-syllable line, a departure from the pentameter standard, is metrically irregular and rather cumbersome, handled effectively only in the second couplet. And the syntax is elliptical, inverted, or convoluted in fully half of the lines.

Nott's violations against moral and stylistic propriety are also apparent when his translations are juxtaposed to Lamb's. Both translated Catullus's apology for his love poetry, but their treatments of the opening lines are significantly different:

Pedicabo ego vos et irrumabo, Aureli pathice et cinaede Furi, qui me ex versiculis meis putastis, quod sunt molliculi, parum pudicum.

I'll treat you as 'tis meet, I swear, Notorious pathics as ye are!
 Aurelius, Furius! who arraign
 And judge me by my wanton strain.

(Nott 1795: I, 51)

And dare ye, Profligates, arraign
 The ardour of my sprightly strain,
 And e'en myself asperse?

(Lamb 1821: I, 35)

Neither version went as far as the Latin text in specifying the nature of the sexual acts: Catullus's "pedicabo" and "irrumabo" indicate anal and oral intercourse. But Nott's "pathics" was obviously much closer to the Latin than Lamb's "profligates." The word "pathics" was a term of abuse used since the seventeenth century to mean "a man or boy upon whom sodomy is practised; a catamite" (OED). Hence its abusiveness conveyed Catullus's Roman assumption that a male who submitted to anal and oral intercourse – whether willingly or not – was humiliated whereas "the penetrator himself was neither demeaned nor disgraced” (Wiseman 1985: 11). Lamb’s choice of “profligates” effectively expurgated the Latin text, but his bourgeois sense of propriety was so intense that he felt compelled to mention the expurgation in a footnote, where he also sought to excuse the coarseness of Catullus’s language: it was seen as expressing the intensity of his hurt feelings:

This poem is a very free imitation of the original, which could not be tolerated if translated literally. Pezay says, this poem being addressed by Catullus to his two great friends, should be looked upon “comme une petite gaité.” The tone is rather of serious indignation at the comments on his poems; and he may have been the more exasperated at such treatment from those whom he had considered his friends and defenders.

The sacred bard, to Muses dear, Himself should pass a chaste career.

This assertion of the purity of character which a loose poet should and may preserve has been brought forward both by Ovid, Martial, and Ausonius, in their own defence.

(Lamb 1821: II, 141)

Lamb’s version was a paragon, not just of propriety, but of fluency too. Nott used another false rhyme (“swear”/“ye are”) and created a somewhat ungainly movement from one couplet to the next, abruptly shifting from declarative statement to epithet to apostrophe. Lamb evidently borrowed Nott’s one true rhyme in the passage, but he put it to much more elegant use by making the syntax more continuous and varying the meter more subtly.

There is perhaps no better illustration of the translators’ different practices than their versions of Carmen V, the object of innumerable English translations and imitations since the sixteenth century:

Vivamus, mea Lesbia, atque amemus, rumoresque senum severiorum omnes unius aestimemus assis.
soles occidere et redire possunt:
nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux, nox est perpetua una dormienda.
da mi basia mille, deinde centum, dein mille altera, dein secunda centum, deinde usque altera mille, deinde centum.
dein, cum milia multa fecerimus, conturbabimus illa, ne sciamus, aut ne quis malus invidere possit, cum tantum sciat esse basiorum.

Let's live, and love, my darling fair!
 And not a single farthing care
 For age's babbling spite;
 Yon suns that set again shall rise;
 But, when our transient meteor dies,
 We sleep in endless night:

Then first a thousand kisses give,
 An hundred let me next receive,
 Another thousand yet;
 To these a second hundred join,
 Still be another thousand mine,
 An hundred then repeat:

Such countless thousands let there be,
 Sweetly confus'd; that even we May know not the amount;
 That envy, so immense a store
 Beholding, may not have the pow'r
 Each various kiss to count.

(Nott 1795: I, 17)

Nott's first stanza possesses considerable fluency, with its continuous syntax woven through a moderately intricate rhyme scheme, but in the second stanza the false rhymes proliferate, and the third fairly creaks with syntactical inversions and suspensions and the jarring rhyme on "store"/"pow'r." Nott's suggestive revisions of the text stress the opposition between the morality of age ("babbling spite") and the passion of youth ("transient meteor") and include a couple of mildly sexual references, the erotic pleasure signified by "sweetly confus'd" and the experienced sexuality hinted in "various" kinds of "kisses." Nott's second stanza also revises the Latin (by shifting from "give" to "receive"), creating the rakish image of the male lover passively receiving Lesbia's kisses and thus exaggerating, somewhat comically, the male fantasy of female sexual aggressiveness in Catullus's text. Nott's masculinist translation is a humorous, slightly prurient, and not entirely felicitous celebration of the lovers' youth and sexuality against age and moral strictness. Its sexual frankness conflicts with Lamb's more decorous version, in which the lovers are given to shameful "blushing":

Love, my Lesbia, while we live;
 Value all the cross advice
 That the surly greybeards give
 At a single farthing's price.
 Suns that set again may rise;
 We, when once our fleeting light,

Once our day in darkness dies,
Sleep in one eternal night.

Give me kisses thousand-fold,
Add to them a hundred more;
Other thousands still be told
Other hundreds o'er and o'er.

But, with thousands when we burn,
Mix, confuse the sums at last,
That we may not blushing learn
All that have between us past.

None shall know to what amount Envy's due for so much bliss;
None – for none shall ever count
All the kisses we will kiss.

(Lamb 1821: I, 12–13)

Compared to Nott's, Lamb's translation is distinguished by an extreme fluency: the quatrains unwind quickly, driven by a smoothly varied trochaic meter, and they parcel out the meaning in precise syntactical units, recurring with a regularity that threatens to call attention to its artificial quality, but remains unobtrusive, easy, light. Lamb's additions to the Latin text at once make more explicit the sexual nature of the theme ("burn") and point to the lovers' modesty ("blushing"), a contradiction that is symptomatic of the translator's labor of domestication. Lamb's version, unlike Nott's, is cast as a seduction ("Love, my Lesbia") and thus follows the traditional English treatment of the Latin text: in Jonson's Volpone (1605), for instance, an imitation of Catullus's poem is used by Volpone to seduce the chaste Celia. And since Lamb's "greybeards," unlike Nott's "age," reproduces the male gender that Catullus assigns to the voice of morality, the relationship between the lovers takes on the form of a family romance, with the male lover locked in an oedipal struggle against the patriarchs for control over Lesbia's sexuality. Lamb's final stanza borrows another of Nott's rhymes ("amount"/"count"), and once again this borrowing reveals the different values shaping their translations: in Nott's, the kissing is seen by the envious ("beholding"), the affair treated as public knowledge, whereas in Lamb's the kissing seems to be shielded by privacy ("none shall know," "none shall ever count"). Both versions domesticate the Latin text to some degree, most obviously in their choice of verse form and their use of "farthing" to render the Latin for a bronze coin ("assis"); but Lamb's is traced by various bourgeois values – fluency, moral propriety, the patriarchal family, privacy – whereas Nott's constitutes a significant deviation, if not simply a violation of them.

This is in fact the reading that emerges in a survey of contemporary responses to the translations. In the late 1790s, Nott's seemed so foreign to English tastes, it provided such an uncomfortably alien reading experience, that it was repeatedly damned on moral and stylistic grounds. The reviewer for the Gentleman's Magazine made clear how moral offense could be a bourgeois gesture of social superiority by linking Nott's translation to the popular taste for the Gothic novel, its sensationalized sexuality: "How any man could have presumed to debauch the minds of his countrymen by translating 'indecenties so frequent in this lascivious poet, which the chaste reader must think best omitted,' [...] is a problem which only those who have read such novels as 'The Monk' can solve" (Gentleman's Magazine 1798: 408).

The disapproval of Nott's "lascivious" translation was general in the literary periodicals, crossing factional lines and thus revealing their common bourgeois assumptions. The British Critic, a Tory magazine started by Anglican clergymen who opposed parliamentary reform, asserted that "We object, from moral principles, to the translator's plan" and insisted that the translation "should be sedulously removed from youth and from females" (British Critic 1798: 672); whereas the liberal Monthly Review added a carefully worded comment that at once admitted the possibility of another reading of Catullus and refused to sanction it: "though we may appear fastidious to the present translator, we confess that in our opinion a judicious selection of his poems would have been more acceptable to the public" (Monthly Review 1797: 278).¹³

Nott's translation was neglected by the periodicals, with the first reviews appearing several years after publication and in very small number. Lamb's translation was widely reviewed as soon as it was published; and even though judgments were mixed, they were stated in the same bourgeois terms and tended to be much more favorable than Nott's. The usually contentious reviewers turned not so much nonpartisan as class-conscious in their embrace of Lamb's version. The liberal Monthly Magazine, which announced itself in its first number as "an enterprise on behalf of intellectual liberty against the forces of panic conservatism" (Sullivan 1983b: 314–19), praised Lamb's expurgation of Catullus's text:

the more correct moral feeling of modern times, would never permit a complete version of many of those objectionable passages in which he abounds. This portion of his task Mr. Lamb has executed with considerable judgment, and we need not fear that our delicacy may be wounded in perusing the pages of his translation.

(Monthly Magazine 1821: 34)

The reactionary Anti-Jacobin Review enlisted Lamb in its struggle against the opponents of church, state, and nation:

The extreme impropriety of many Poems written by Catullus, has obliged Mr. Lamb to omit them, and had he turned his attention wholly to some purer author, it would have honoured his powers of selection. At this hour of contest between the good and evil principle among us, when so many are professedly Atheists, and blasphemy is encouraged by subscription, and sedition supported by charities, no patriot and christian would assist vice by palliating its excesses, or render them less offensive by a decent veil. [...] Mr. Lamb is entitled to both the above characters of patriot and christian.

(Anti-Jacobin Review 1821: 14)

Reviewers also faulted Nott's translation for lacking fluency. The Monthly Review remarked that "we would praise this translator for his general correctness with respect to the English version, yet his inattention to rhyme is too gross and too frequent not to incur censure" (Monthly Review 1797: 278). The British Critic complained of "great irregularities both with regard to the spirit, correctness, and harmony" (British Critic 1798: 671–2). Lamb's prosody was apparently not spirited enough for several reviewers – his versions of the "minor pieces" get described as "languid," or devoid of "poetical ease and beauty" – but at least one magazine, the Monthly Review, found that he "preserved no small portion of the spirit and dignity of the original," singling out Lamb's rendering of Carmen V for special praise as "the best which we have seen, with the exception only of Ben Jonson's," recognizing Lamb's Catullus as a peculiarly English phenomenon, indicative of the dominance of fluency in poetry translation (Monthly Review 1822: 11, 9).

We can more fully understand the translators' different motives and practices by considering their translations in the context of their other work, their lives, and their different historical moments. A practicing physician who was constantly engaged in literary projects, Nott (1751–1825) published a number of books that drew impressively on the tradition of the love lyric in classical, European, and Oriental languages (Gentleman's Magazine 1825: 565–6; DNB). Late in his career, he wrote a prose romance entitled Sappho (1803), made a selection from Robert Herrick's Hesperides (1810), and edited a miscellany of sixteenth-century English poetry beginning with Sir Thomas Wyatt (1812). The bulk of his work, however, was translation, and over a thirty-year period he produced book-length translations of Johannes Secundus Nicolaius (1775), Petrarch (1777), Propertius (1782), Hafiz (1787), Bonefonius (1797), Lucretius (1799), and Horace (1803). The Catullus translation (1795) was an obvious choice for a translator with Nott's interests and energies.

He was so prolific because he felt that more was at stake in translating than literary appreciation, even though aesthetic values always guided his choices as well. The mimetic concept of translation that made him choose a foreignizing practice to signal the differences of Catullus's texts also made him think of his work as an act of cultural restoration. This was the rationale he often gave in his prefatory statements. His "Attempt to transfer unblemished into the English language the numberless Beauties with which the Basia of Secundus abound" was intended to draw "a deserving Author from that Oblivion in which he has been so long buried," a reference to the more than four decades that had elapsed since the last English translation (Nott 1778: vii). Finding it "astonishing, considering his merit," that Propertius had never been translated into English, Nott intended his version “to repair this neglect” (Nott 1782: iii–iv). For Nott, translation performed the work of cultural restoration by revising the canon of foreign literature in English, supporting the admission of some marginalized texts and occasionally questioning the canonicity of others – even when he translated simple Latin verse such as that of Secundus into the style of a “rococo Parnassian” (Cummings 2005: 499). The foreignizing gesture lay in the very choice of foreign texts for translation (although using such a style for Secundus would be a defamiliarizing throwback during a period of emerging romanticism). In his preface to his selection from the Persian poet Hafiz, Nott boldly challenged the English veneration of classical antiquity by suggesting that Western European culture originated in the East:

we lament, whilst years are bestowed in acquiring an insight into the Greek and Roman authors, that those very writers should have been neglected, from whom the Greeks evidently derived both the richness of their mythology, and the peculiar tenderness of their expressions.

(Nott 1787: v–vi)

Nott attacked any Anglocentric dismissal of Oriental poets like Hafiz, arguing the importance of “not judging of the glow of Eastern dialogue by the standard of our colder feelings and ideas,” and he went so far as to suggest that “the more exact rules of English criticism and taste” were complicit with English imperialism:

Was it not probable to suppose, when a fatal ambition had determined us to possess a country, our distance from which made the attempt unnatural; and when, under the pretence of commerce, we became the cruel invaders of another’s right; that we should at least have made ourselves acquainted with the language of the conquered? This was necessary, whether to distribute justice, or to exercise compassion. But private avarice and extortion shut up the gates of public virtue.

(Ibid.: vii)

Of course Nott’s foreignizing practice could never be entirely free of English values and agendas, including the development of a national culture: he felt, for example, that the failure to translate Propertius caused “some degradation to English literature” (Nott 1782: iv). But he was sufficiently sensitive to the ethnocentric violence involved in any encounter with a cultural other to question the imposition of bourgeois canons and interests, whether at home, in translations of foreign literary texts, or abroad, in economic and political relations with foreign countries.

Nott’s frequent travel, including a stint on a colonial expedition, no doubt increased his willingness to resist dominant cultural values at home. After studying medicine in Paris as well as London, he spent years on the Continent as physician to English travellers (1775–7, 1786–8, 1789–93) and made a trip to China as surgeon on a vessel of the East India Company (1783–6). The class in which Nott travelled must also be included among the conditions of his cultural work: the aristocracy.

His father held an appointment in the household of George III, and Nott's patients were generally aristocrats. This class affiliation is important because it indicates an English motive for his interest in foreignizing translation. As a physician, Nott was on intimate terms with a group whose sexual practices, far from exhibiting any bourgeois sense of moral propriety, rivalled those of Catullus's Rome in their variety and sheer frequency, even if they were discussed less openly and with greater refinement – "gallantry" often served as a euphemism for adultery during this period. Lawrence Stone has referred to "plenty of evidence that there was a great deal of extramarital sexual activity among many aristocratic husbands and some aristocratic wives at least as late as the first decade of the nineteenth century" (Stone 1977: 534; Perkin 1989: 89–96).

In Nott's case, we can be more specific. A confirmed bachelor himself, he served as physician to Georgiana Cavendish, Duchess of Devonshire, when she travelled on the Continent between 1789 and 1793 (Posonby 1955; DNB). The fashionable, trend-setting Duchess had been banished abroad by her husband William, the fifth Duke, because gambling losses had driven her deep into debt. In 1792, the Duchess gave birth to a daughter who was assumed to be the offspring of her adultery with Charles Grey, an aggressive young politician who led the Whig party and later became Prime Minister. The Duke himself fathered three illegitimate children, one by a woman with whom he had an affair at the time of his marriage, two by Lady Elizabeth Foster, who separated from her own husband in 1782 and was befriended by the Duke and Duchess. Nott's interest in erotic literature, his refusal to expurgate Catullus's poetry, even the sexual frankness of his translations were due in some part to the casual sexual morality that characterized his aristocratic milieu during the late eighteenth century. His foreignization of the Latin text did in fact answer to English values, however different from those that influenced the periodical reviewers and Lamb.

George Lamb (1784–1834) was born into the same aristocratic milieu as Nott, but thirty years later. The fourth and youngest son of Penniston, Viscount Melbourne, he practiced law for a short while, but left it to pursue various literary and theatrical interests, reviewing for the Edinburgh, contributing prologues to revivals at the Drury Lane, and writing a comic opera that was staged at Covent Garden (Gentleman's Magazine 1834: 437–8; DNB). He eventually entered politics, first as an MP in the Duke of Devonshire's interest and then, on the accession of the Whig ministry, as Under Secretary of State to his brother William, Lord Melbourne. In 1809, George married Caroline St Jules, one of the Duke of Devonshire's illegitimate children with Lady Foster; George's own birth was illegitimate, the result of Lady Melbourne's adultery with the Prince of Wales. Everyone concerned knew of these relations (see Posonby 1955: 2–5; Stuart 1955: 160–3; Cecil 1965: 27). It was Lamb who informed Caroline of her father's identity a few years before their marriage. The Duke gave her a dowry of £30,000; Lamb's response was that "I can only thank him by devoting my future life to Caroline's happiness" (Posonby 1955: 4). The knowledge of these relations extended past the family. In the obituary on Lamb in the Gentleman's Magazine, Caroline was described as “a relation of the Duke of the Devonshire” (Gentleman’s Magazine 1834: 438). Still, everything was treated very discreetly. Lady Foster concocted a genealogy to explain Caroline’s unusual name, “a certain obscure Comte de St. Jules being the supposed father” (Posonby 1955: 4). The most public scandal in Lamb’s family did not involve him: in 1812, Lady Caroline Lamb, his brother William’s wife, was engaged in a notorious affair with Byron. George himself seems to have been happily married. His obituary referred to “the tranquillity of his domestic life,” stating that with the “estimable” Caroline, “of a character entirely assorting with his own, he enjoyed the truest domestic felicity” (Gentleman’s Magazine 1834: 438).

Lamb’s life attests to the fact that the increasing moral conservatism of English society during this period was affecting not only the middle and working classes, but the aristocracy as well. This bourgeois cultural movement towards moral reform, spurred by the rise of Evangelical Christianity and accompanied by the institution of various philanthropic “societies,” led to the proliferation of moral and religious tracts and continued the bowdlerization of literary texts that characterized English poetry translation at least since Pope (Quinlan 1941; Perkin 1989: 90, 120–1, 240).¹⁴ Lamb’s first-hand knowledge of the casual sexual morality among the Whig aristocracy may have made him more receptive to the emergent conservatism in English culture, since there can be no doubt that he contributed to it. His work in the theatre included an adaptation of Shakespeare’s Timon of Athens (Lamb 1816), whose goal, he announced in an “Advertisement,” was “to restore Shakespeare to the stage, with no other omissions than such as the refinement of manners has rendered necessary.” Lamb omitted this dialogue, for example, between Timon and “the churlish Philosopher” Apemantus:

Tim. Wilt thou dine with me, Apemantus?

Apem. No; I eat not lords.

Tim. And thou shouldst, thou’dst anger ladies.

Apem. O they eat lords; so they come by great bellies.

Tim. That’s a lascivious apprehension.

Apem. So thou apprehend’st it; take it for thy labour.

(Shakespeare 1959: I.i.203–8)

Lamb treated Shakespeare just as he did Catullus, expurgating the text of any coarse language, and his like-minded contemporaries approved of his work, with one commentator observing that “much is omitted in the dialogue, and generally with propriety” (Genest 1832: 584). Lamb saw no contradiction between professing liberalism as a Whig politician and censoring canonical literary texts. He followed what David Cecil has called the “canons of Whig orthodoxy. All believed in ordered liberty, low taxation and the enclosure of land; all disbelieved in despotism and democracy” (Cecil 1965: 7).¹⁵

Lamb’s calculated omission of the carnivalesque in his literary projects must be taken as another gesture of social superiority by a member of the hegemonic class. Lamb's elitism, however, was couched in terms that were belletristic instead of social: he viewed a poetry translation or a theatrical adaptation as a refined form of entertainment, an exercise in aesthetic appreciation performed during periods of leisure, often in private. He prefaced his Catullus translation with a poem entitled "Reflections before Publication," wherein he presented his work, not as an engaged act of cultural restoration or canon revision, but as the "pleasing" diversion of an amateur who is now contemplating whether to share it with others:

The pleasing task, which oft a calm has lent
To lull disease and soften discontent;
Has still made busy life's vacations gay,
And saved from idleness the leisure day:
In many a musing walk and lone retreat,
That task is done; – I may not say complete.
Now, have I heart to see the flames devour
The work of many a pleasurable hour?
Deep in some chest must I my offspring thrust,
To know no resurrection from the dust;
Or shall I, printing in this age of paper,
Add to th'unnumber'd stars another taper?
(Lamb 1821: I, ix–x)

Lamb was one of those future aristocrats for whom Sir John Denham developed the domesticating practice of translating classical poetry, shrinking from the prospect of publication because poetry translation was not the serious work of politics or government service. And with an appropriateness that Denham would have appreciated, Lamb's courtly self-effacement was cast in fluent heroic couplets.

In the thirty years that separated Nott's Catullus from Lamb's, the Whiggish aristocratic milieu in which they lived and worked underwent a substantial change that influenced the fate of their translations and translation practices. Fluent, domesticating translation was valorized in accordance with bourgeois moral and literary values, and a notable effort of resistance through a foreignizing practice was decisively displaced. Nott's translation foreignized Catullus by assimilating the Latin text to cultural values that were residual in the 1790s and marginal by the 1820s: a mimetic concept of translation grounded in the paradigm of representation was yielding to a communicative concept of translation grounded in the paradigm of expression; and the casual sexual morality of the aristocracy was challenged by a movement towards moral reform that affected both aristocrat and bourgeois. Nott and Lamb exemplify two options available to translators at a specific moment in the canonization of fluency. Perhaps most importantly, they show that in foreignizing translation, the differences of the foreign text can only ever be figured by values in the receiving culture that differ from those in dominance.

Nation

The translator who attaches himself closely to his original more or less abandons the originality of his nation, and so a third comes into existence, and the taste of the multitude must first be shaped towards it.

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (tr. André Lefevere)

The search for alternatives to domesticating translation leads to theories and practices that aim to signify the foreignness of the foreign text. At the start of the nineteenth century, foreignizing translation lacked cultural capital in English, but it was very active in the formation of another national culture – German. In 1813, during the Napoleonic wars, Friedrich Schleiermacher’s lecture Ueber die verschiedenen Methoden des Uebersetzens (“On the Different Methods of Translating”) viewed translation as an important practice in the Prussian nationalist movement: it could enrich the German language by developing an elite literature and thus enable German culture to realize its historical destiny of global domination. And yet, surprisingly, Schleiermacher proposed this nationalist agenda by theorizing translation as the locus of cultural difference, not the homogeneity that his ideological configuration might imply, and that, in various historically specific forms, has long prevailed in English-language translation, British and American. Schleiermacher’s translation theory rested on a chauvinistic condescension towards foreign cultures, a sense of their ultimate inferiority to German-language culture, but also on an antichauvinistic respect for their differences, a sense that German-language culture is inferior and therefore must attend to them if it is to develop.

These contradictory tendencies are peculiar to the vernacular nationalist movements that swept through Europe during the early nineteenth century, and they indicate that Schleiermacher’s translation theory can be detached from the ideological purpose it was intended to serve and be put to other uses. The central contradiction of vernacular nationalist movements is that they are at once made possible and vulnerable by language (see Venuti 2005b). As Benedict Anderson has observed, “seen as both a historical fatality and as a community imagined through language, the nation presents itself as simultaneously open and closed” because “language is not an instrument of exclusion: in principle, anyone can learn any language” (Anderson 1991: 134, 146). Language forms the particular solidarity that is the basis of the nation, but the openness of any language to new uses allows nationalist narratives to be rewritten – especially when this language is the receptor of translations that are foreignizing, most interested in the cultural differences of the foreign text.

If, as Schleiermacher believed, a foreignizing translation practice can be useful in building a national culture, forging a foreign-based cultural identity for a linguistic community about to achieve political autonomy, it can also undermine any concept of nation by challenging cultural canons, disciplinary boundaries, and national values in the translating language. This is borne out by the English translation controversy that pitted Francis Newman’s foreignizing Iliad (1856) against Matthew Arnold’s Oxford lectures On Translating Homer (1860): Newman’s theory of foreignization requires the development of translation strategies that deviate from Victorian standards of transparent discourse, but also from an Arnoldian concept of the national culture that favors an academic elite. The following genealogy reconstructs a foreignizing translation tradition, partly German, partly English, examines the specific cultural situations in which this tradition took shape, and evaluates its usefulness in combating domesticating translation in the present.

I Schleiermacher’s foreignizing method

For Schleiermacher, “the genuine translator” is a writer who wants to bring those two completely separated persons, his author and his reader, truly together, and who would like to bring the latter to an understanding and enjoyment of the former as correct and complete as possible without inviting him to leave the sphere of his mother tongue.

Antoine Berman has called attention to the hermeneutical paradigm introduced here, the emphasis on translation as an object of textual interpretation and a means of interpersonal communication, “a method of intersubjective encounter” (“un processus de rencontre intersubjectif”) (Berman 1984: 235). And this makes communication the criterion by which methodological choices are validated and authentic translation distinguished from inauthentic. Schleiermacher in fact finds only two methods of effecting the reader’s understanding of the foreign author: “Either the translator leaves the author in peace, as much as possible, and moves the reader towards him; or he leaves the reader in peace, as much as possible, and moves the author towards him” (74). Schleiermacher privileges the first method, making the reader of the translation travel abroad, and he describes the authentic translator’s “aim” in social terms, with translation offering an understanding of the foreign text that is not merely ethnocentric, but relative to a specific social group:

the translator must therefore take as his aim to give his reader the same image and the same delight which the reading of the work in the original language would afford any reader educated in such a way that we call him, in the better sense of the word, the lover and the expert [“Leibhaber und Kenner”/“amateur et connaisseur”], the type of reader who is familiar with the foreign language while it yet always remains foreign to him: he no longer has to think every single part in his mother tongue, as schoolboys do, before he can grasp the whole, but he is still conscious of the difference between that language and his mother tongue, even where he enjoys the beauty of the foreign work in total peace.

The translator aims to signify the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text, but only as they are perceived in the translation by a limited readership, an educated elite. This means, first, that translation is always ethnocentric: even when a translated text contains discursive peculiarities designed to imitate a foreign text, even when the translation seems, in Schleiermacher’s (English translator’s) words, “bent towards a foreign likeness” (78–9; “zu einer fremden Aehnlichkeit hinübergelugt”: 227), it never escapes the hierarchy of cultural values inscribed in the translating language. These values mediate every move in the translation and every reader’s response to it, including the perception of what is domestic or foreign: André Lefevere’s English version – “bent towards a foreign likeness” – domesticates Schleiermacher’s German by submitting its syntax to the dominant fluent strategy, whereas “towards a foreign likeness bent,” a discursive peculiarity that resists fluency by marking the English translation as archaic for contemporary British and American readers, foreignizes English by bending it towards the German syntax. Interestingly, to imitate the German this closely is not to be more faithful to it, but to be more English, that is, consistent with an English syntactical inversion that is now archaic.

Schleiermacher’s theory anticipates these observations. He was keenly aware that translation strategies are situated in specific cultural formations where discourses are canonized or marginalized, circulating in relations of domination and exclusion. Thus the translation method that cultivates discursive peculiarities to imitate the foreignness of the foreign text “cannot thrive equally well in all languages, but only in those which are not the captives of too strict a bond of classical expression outside of which all is reprehensible”; the ideal site for this method is “languages which are freer, in which innovations and deviations are tolerated to a greater extent, in such a way that their accumulation may, under certain circumstances, generate a certain characteristic mode of expression” (79–80). This linguistic and cultural freedom is complexly determined: not only is it defined against the “bonded languages” of other national cultures, but the “innovations and deviations” of foreignizing translation are defined against the norm set by other translation discourses in the receiving culture. And since Schleiermacher’s advocacy of the foreignizing method was also an advocacy of discourses specific to an educated elite, he was investing this limited social group with considerable cultural authority, going so far as to assign it a precise social function – to “generate a certain characteristic mode of expression,” developing a national language, “influencing the whole evolution of a culture” (80–1; “die gesammte Geistesentwicklung”: 231). Here it becomes clear that Schleiermacher was enlisting his privileged translation practice in a cultural political agenda: an educated elite controls the formation of a national culture by refining its language through foreignizing translations.

Schleiermacher’s lecture permits a much more detailed social and historical specification of this agenda. He concludes with some explicit references to “we Germans,” remarking that “our nation,” “because of its respect for what is foreign and its mediating nature” (88; “seiner vermittelnden Natur”: 243), uniquely satisfies the “two conditions” necessary for foreignizing translation to thrive, namely “that understanding foreign works should be a thing known and desired and that the native language should be allowed a certain flexibility” (81). This is the understanding of foreign works sought by educated “Germans” like Schleiermacher, a university professor and minister in the Reformed church, who feels that the German language possesses the “flexibility” to support foreignizing translation since it is undeveloped, lacking a definite “mode of expression,” not yet “bonded” to the “classical,” a “partial mother tongue”: “our language, because we exercise it less owing to our Nordic sluggishness, can thrive in all its freshness and completely develop its own power only through the most many-sided contacts with what is foreign” (88). Since the category “foreign” here is determined by the educated, Schleiermacher is using translation to mark out a dominant space for a bourgeois minority in early nineteenth-century German culture.

As Albert Ward observes of this period, literature was [...] a predominantly bourgeois art, but it was only a small part of this section of the community that responded most readily to the classical writers of the great age of German literature. [...] Writers like Goethe and Schiller found their public in the Honoratioren of the large towns, in the university-trained professional men, the ministers of religion, teachers, doctors, and lawyers, in what might be termed the elite of middle-class society. “High literature” was then even more than now a thing for a small group of scholars.

(Ward 1974: 128)²

Ward demonstrates the cultural and economic marginality of German “literature,” both classical and romantic, by referring to sizes of editions and sales figures amid some striking testimonies from contemporaries in the publishing industry:

Karl Preusker, who came to Leipzig as a bookseller’s apprentice in 1805, names in his autobiography the authors most in demand at that time; the most classical (as we understand the term today) of the authors on his list is Zschokke, “whereas the works of Schiller and Goethe were sold in only meagre quantities.”

(Ibid.: 132)

Schleiermacher, who associated with the leading German romantics, briefly shared a Berlin apartment with Friedrich Schlegel, and contributed to the Schlegel brothers’ small-circulation journal, the Athenaeum, was entirely in agreement with Goethe when developing his theory of foreignizing translation. In an essay on “Wieland’s brotherly memory” published in February of 1813, four months before Schleiermacher’s lecture, Goethe wrote:

there are two maxims in translation: one requires that the author of a foreign nation be brought across to us in such a way that we can look on him as ours; the other requires that we should go across to what is foreign and adapt ourselves to its conditions, its use of language, its peculiarities. The advantages of both are sufficiently known to educated people through perfect examples. Our friend, who looked for the middle way in this, too, tried to reconcile both, but as a man of feeling and taste he preferred the first maxim when in doubt.

(Lefevere 1977: 39)

In siding with this “feeling and taste” for “what is foreign,” Schleiermacher was valorizing an elite bourgeois cultural discourse of literary refinement against the larger, more heterogeneous culture of the middle and working classes. “The average middle-class reader,” Ward points out, “wanted works which were within his own experience and range of emotion, reflecting his own interests and not conflicting with the demands of his morality” (Ward 1974: 133). Whereas Schleiermacher’s lecture on translation is quite scholarly in citing only Greek and Latin writing (Plato, Cicero, Tacitus, Grotius, and Leibniz), the wider middle-class readership favored Gothic tales, chivalric romances, realistic novels both sentimental and didactic, biographies of exemplary men, travel literature. This audience was reading translations as well, but the greatest percentage consisted of translations from French and English novels, including the work of Laclos and Richardson. Schleiermacher himself had translated Plato, while other romantics – Voss, August Wilhelm Schlegel, Hölderlin – translated Homer, Sophocles, Dante, and Shakespeare. They were very much aware that they were translating for a relatively narrow audience, even a coterie, and like Schleiermacher, they saw this social fact as a value that improved their “literature” and endowed it with cultural authority. Friedrich Schlegel boasted that “[readers] are forever complaining that German authors write for such a small circle, often in fact for themselves as a group. I find this a good thing. German literature gains more and more in spirit and character because of it” (Ward 1974: 191, n. 46).

Schlegel’s comment shows that this is not only a bourgeois, but a nationalist concept of literature – “German.” And Schleiermacher’s theory of foreignizing translation reveals a similar ideological configuration: it is also pitched against a German nobility that was not literary and had long lain under French cultural domination. Aristocratic culture eschewed scholarly research and wide reading in past and contemporary literature; “the few courts which did take an active interest in literary affairs,” Ward notes, “were characterized by a predominantly bourgeois atmosphere” (Ward 1974: 128). In aristocratic education, “the accent was on languages, particularly French, and often to such an extent that many noblemen could express themselves better in that language than in their mother tongue” (ibid.: 123). In a letter from 1757, the aesthete and dramatist Johann Christoph Gottsched described an audience with Frederick II, during which he informed the Prussian king of the serious threat to literary culture posed by the Gallicized nobility:

When I said that German writers did not receive sufficient encouragement, as the aristocracy and the courts spoke too much French and understood too little German to be able to grasp and appreciate fully anything written in German, he said: that is true, for I haven't read no German book since my youth, and je parle comme un cocher, but I am an old fellow of forty-six and have no time for such things.

Some fifty years later, Schleiermacher's lecture on translation engages in the cultural struggle for a German literature with an equally bold criticism of Frederick II. Schleiermacher represents the king, however, not as Gottsched's anti-intellectual oaf, but as a German intellect limited by his utter dependence on French:

Our great king received all his finer and higher thoughts in a foreign language, which he had most intimately appropriated for this field. He was incapable of producing in German the literature and philosophy he produced in French. It is to be deplored that the great preference for England which dominated a part of the family could not have taken the direction of familiarizing him from childhood on with the English language, whose last golden age was then in bloom, and which is so much closer to German. But we may hope that he would have preferred to produce literature and philosophy in Latin, rather than in French, if he had enjoyed a strict scholarly education.

(Lefevre 1977: 83)

Here the vernacular nationalism in Schleiermacher's cultural politics becomes more evident: the king is taken to task not so much because he is not “scholarly” (he is in fact portrayed as being genuinely interested in “literature and philosophy”), but because he doesn't write in German, or in a language “closer to German” than French. Whereas Gottsched seems to be lamenting the dearth of literary patronage (“sufficient encouragement”) because the Prussian aristocracy is Francophone,

Schleiermacher is more concerned about the unequal cultural production in German and French: “He was incapable of producing in German.”

Schleiermacher’s criticism of the king is a nationalist protest against French domination in Germany, and it is consistent with his intense activity in the Prussian movement for German unification during the Napoleonic wars. As Jerry Dawson makes clear, the war between France and Prussia in 1806, with the resulting collapse of the Prussian armies and the humiliating peace terms dictated to Prussia by Napoleon, proved to be the final factor needed to turn [Schleiermacher] to nationalism with a complete and almost reckless abandon.

(Dawson 1966: 51)³

“Germany” did not actually exist at this time: west of the Rhine were several petty principalities, which, after 1806, Napoleon organized into a “confederation”; east was the dominant German-speaking monarchy, Prussia, now dominated by the French. The Prussian defeat caused Schleiermacher to lose his appointment at the University of Halle, and he fled to Berlin, the Prussian capital, where he lectured at the university and preached at various churches. His sermons urged political and military resistance against the French armies, developing a cultural concept of nationality based on the German language and legitimized with Protestant theology. In 1813, three months before his lecture on translation at the Berlin Akademie der Wissenschaften and eight months before Napoleon was finally defeated at the Battle of Leipzig, Schleiermacher delivered a sermon entitled “A Nation’s Duty in a War for Freedom,” in which he represented the war with France as a struggle against cultural and political domination. If victorious, he exhorted the congregation, “we shall be able to preserve for ourselves our own distinctive character, our laws, our constitution and our culture” (Schleiermacher 1890: 73).

In June, the month of his lecture, Schleiermacher wrote a letter to Friedrich Schlegel in which his nationalism turned utopian:

My greatest wish after liberation, is for one true German Empire, powerfully representing the entire German folk and territory to the outside world, while internally allowing the various Länder and their princes a great deal of freedom to develop and rule according to their own particular needs.

(Sheehan 1989: 379)

This vision of Germany as a union of relatively autonomous principalities was partly a compensation for the then prevailing international conflict, and it is somewhat backward-looking, traced with a nostalgia for the political organization that prevailed before the French occupation. Napoleon had introduced social innovations achieved by the revolution, abolishing feudalism in Prussia and promoting “enlightened” despotism. Schleiermacher himself was a member of a bourgeois cultural elite, but his nationalist ideology is such that it admits aristocracy, monarchy, even an imperialist tendency – but only when they constitute a national unity resistant to foreign domination.

Presented to the Prussian academic establishment on 24 June 1813, at the height of the conflict with France, Schleiermacher's lecture constructs a role for translation in a nationalist cultural politics. His theory of foreignizing translation should be seen as anti-French because it opposes the translation practice that dominated France since neoclassicism, viz. domestication, making the foreign author travel abroad to the reader of the translation. When surveying the limited acceptance of foreignizing translation in Western culture, Schleiermacher reserves his most withering sarcasm for France:

The ancients obviously translated little in that most real sense and most moderns, deterred by the difficulties of true translation, also seem to be satisfied with imitation and paraphrase. Who would want to contend that nothing has ever been translated into French from the classical languages or from the Germanic languages! But even though we Germans are perfectly willing to listen to this advice, we should not follow it.

(Lefevere 1977: 88)

French exemplifies those languages that are “captives of too strict a bond of classical expression outside of which all is reprehensible,” especially the innovations and deviations introduced by foreignizing translation. In a satiric dialogue from 1798, A. W. Schlegel had already made explicit the nationalist ideology at work in identifying French culture with a domesticating translation practice:

- Frenchman: The Germans translate every literary Tom, Dick, and Harry. We either do not translate at all, or else we translate according to our own taste.
- German: Which is to say, you paraphrase and you disguise.
- Frenchman: We look on a foreign author as a stranger in our company, who has to dress and behave according to our customs, if he desires to please.
- German: How narrow-minded of you to be pleased only by what is native.
- Frenchman: Such is our nature and our education. Did the Greeks not hellenize everything as well?
- German: In your case it goes back to a narrow-minded nature and a conventional education. In ours education is our nature.

(Ibid.: 50)⁴

Schlegel's dialogue indicates the metaphysical underpinnings of German nationalism, its assumption of a biological or racial essence from which the national culture issues: “education is our nature.” This agrees both with Schleiermacher's view that “our nation” possesses a “mediating nature” and with the organic metaphor he uses to describe the effect of foreignizing translation on German:

Just as our soil itself has no doubt become richer and more fertile and our climate milder and more pleasant only after much transplantation of foreign flora, just so we sense that our language, because we exercise it less owing to our Nordic sluggishness, can thrive in all its freshness and completely develop its own power only through the most many-sided contacts with what is foreign.

(Ibid.: 88)

Schleiermacher's nationalist theory of foreignizing translation aims to challenge French hegemony not only by enriching German culture, but by contributing to the formation of a liberal public sphere, an area of social life in which private individuals exchange rational discourse and exercise political influence:

If ever the time should come in which we have a public life out of which develops a sociability of greater merit and truer to language, and in which free space is gained for the talent of the orator, we shall be less in need of translation for the development of language.

(Ibid.: 89)

Yet Schleiermacher's public sphere manifests the contradiction that characterized the concept from its emergence in eighteenth-century aesthetics. As Peter Uwe Hohendahl puts it, "although in principle the capacity to form an accurate opinion is considered present in everyone, in practice it is limited to the educated" (Hohendahl 1982: 51). So in Schleiermacher: although the work of foreignizing translation on the German language is seen as creating a national culture free of French political domination, this public space is open explicitly for "the talent of the orator," a literary elite.

Because this is a strongly nationalist elite, it employs foreignizing translation in a remarkable project of German cultural imperialism, through which the linguistic community "destined" for global domination achieves it. Here nationalism is equivalent to universalism:

An inner necessity, in which a peculiar calling of our people expresses itself clearly enough, has driven us to translating en masse; we cannot go back and we must go on. [...] And coincidentally our nation may be destined, because of its respect for what is foreign and its mediating nature, to carry all the treasures of foreign arts and scholarship, together with its own, in its language, to unite them into a great historical whole, so to speak, which would be preserved in the centre and heart of Europe, so that with the help of our language, whatever beauty the most different times have brought forth can be enjoyed by all people, as purely and perfectly as is possible for a foreigner. This appears indeed to be the real historical aim of translation in general, as we are used to it now.

(Lefevere 1977: 88)

Thus readers of the canon of world literature would experience the linguistic and cultural differences of foreign texts, but only as differences that are Eurocentric, mediated by a German bourgeois elite. Ultimately it would seem that foreignizing translation does not so much introduce the foreign into German culture as use the foreign to confirm and develop a sameness, a process of fashioning an ideal cultural self on the basis of an other, a cultural narcissism, which is endowed, moreover, with historical necessity. This method of translation “makes sense and is of value only to a nation that has the definite inclination to appropriate what is foreign” (ibid.: 80).

The ideological ensemble in Schleiermacher’s cultural politics precipitates contradictory permutations (elite literature/national culture, bourgeois minority/“Germany,” foreignizing/Germanizing), so we should not be surprised to find him speaking for and against foreign imports in German culture – in that same turbulent year, 1813. His bourgeois nationalism shapes both his advocacy of “many-sided contacts with the foreign” in the translation lecture and his xenophobic condescension in the patriotic sermon: “Every nation, my dear friends, which has developed a particular or clearly defined height is degraded also by receiving into it a foreign element” (Schleiermacher 1890: 73–4). This assumes, contrary to the lecture, that German culture has already attained a significant level of development, presumably in classical and romantic literature, which must be protected from foreign contamination and imposed universally, through a specifically German foreignization of world literature. Schleiermacher’s translation theory intervenes in “die gesammte Geistesentwicklung,” a phrase that may seem restricted nationally in Lefevere’s English, “the whole evolution of a culture” (Lefevere 1977: 81), but is shown to have worldwide application in Berman’s French: “le processus global de la formation de l’esprit” (Berman 1985: 333). And only Berman discloses the idealist metaphysics at work in the German text by choosing “esprit” for “Geist.”

Schleiermacher’s theory is shaky ground on which to build a translation ethics to combat ethnocentrism: his lecture does not recognize any contradiction in asserting that “our nation” is distinguished by “respect for what is foreign” while envisioning the geopolitical domination of a German bourgeois cultural elite. It also does not recognize antinomies in its thinking about language and human subjectivity which are likewise determined by a bourgeois nationalism. Schleiermacher evinces an extraordinarily clear sense of the constitutive properties of language, those that make representation always an appropriative activity, never transparent or merely adequate to its object, active in the construction of subjectivity by establishing forms for consciousness. The “proper field” of the translator, Schleiermacher states, consists of those mental products of scholarship and art in which the free idiosyncratic combinatory powers of the author and the spirit of the language which is the repository of a system of observations and shades of moods are everything, in which the object no longer dominates in any way, but is dominated by thoughts and emotions, in which, indeed, the object has become object only through speech and is present only in conjunction with speech.

At the same time, however, Schleiermacher's concept of "free idiosyncratic combinatory powers" signals a move towards an autonomous subject whose "thoughts and emotions" transcend linguistic determinations. "On the one hand," Schleiermacher asserts, every man is in the power of the language he speaks, and all his thinking is a product thereof. [...] Yet on the other hand every freely thinking, mentally self-employed human being shapes his own language. [...] Therefore each free and higher speech needs to be understood twice, once out of the spirit of the language of whose elements it is composed, as a living representation bound and defined by that spirit and conceived out of it in the speaker, and once out of the speaker's emotions, as his action, as produced and explicable only out of his own being.

(Ibid.: 71)

The "spirit of the language" determines every speech act, is binding on every subject, but part of that action nevertheless answers only to an individual "being." At one point, the priority of language over subject is tellingly reversed, with the author becoming the sole origin of the "spirit": the readers of a foreignizing translation are said to "understand" when they "perceive the spirit of the language which was the author's own and [are] able to see his peculiar way of thinking and feeling" (ibid.: 72). As Berman points out, Schleiermacher's lecture manifests the late eighteenth-century shift from representation to expression as the conceptual paradigm for language, and hence subject displaces object as the basis of interpretation (Berman 1984: 233). Schleiermacher's thinking about language is informed by romantic expressive theory, grounded in the concept of free, unified consciousness that characterizes bourgeois individualism.

We understand the spoken word as an act of the speaker only when we feel at the same time where and how the power of language has taken hold of him, where in its current the lightning of thought has uncoiled, snake-like, where and how the roving imagination has been held firm in its forms. We understand the spoken word as a product of language and as an expression of its spirit only when we feel that only a Greek, for instance, could think and speak in that way, that only this particular language could operate in a human mind this way, and when we feel at the same time that only this man could think and speak in the Greek fashion in this way, that only he could seize and shape the language in this manner, that only his living possession of the riches of language reveals itself like this, an alert sense for measure and euphony which belongs to him alone, a power of thinking and shaping which is peculiarly his.

The metaphors – “lightning,” “snake-like,” “roving” – continue the individualistic strain by depicting the subject as a coherent essence, radically independent of language, given to serpentine, potentially subversive “thought,” possessing a free “imagination” that takes on various accidental “forms” (obviously, “lightning” and “snake-like” also resonate with mythological and theological allusions, especially in a lecture by a classical scholar and Protestant minister – but these possibilities will not be pursued here). The most striking move in this passage may well be Schleiermacher’s example, which initiates a discontinuous series of specifications and revisions, putting the individual in command, first, of a national culture with a literary canon (“the riches of language”; cf. the international “treasures of foreign arts and scholarship”: ibid.: 88), then a specifically literary, even scholarly appreciation of the Greek language (“measure and euphony”), and finally a cognitive “power” that is “peculiarly his,” self-expressive and fundamentally self-determining.

The passage is a reminder that Schleiermacher is setting up the understanding of language associated with a particular national cultural elite as the standard by which language use is made intelligible and judged. Hence, in the case of foreignizing translation, “the reader of the translation will become the equal of the better reader of the original only when he is able first to acquire an impression of the particular spirit of the author as well as that of the language in the work” (Lefevere 1977: 80). Yet the author-orientation in Schleiermacher’s theory, his anthropomorphosis of translation from an intertextual to an intersubjective relationship, psychologizes the translated text and thus masks its cultural and social determinations. This is the much criticized move in Schleiermacher’s hermeneutics: he tends to evaporate the determinate nature of the text by articulating a two-fold interpretive process, both “grammatical” and “technical or psychological.”⁵ A grammatical explanation of the objective “connection between the work and the language” combines with a psychological explanation of the subjective “connection between the work and the thought involved in it” (Szondi 1986: 103). Schleiermacher, however, sometimes collapses this distinction, as in his aphorisms on hermeneutics from 1809–10, which refer to “combining the objective and subjective so that the interpreter can put himself ‘inside’ the author” (Schleiermacher 1977: 64). In the case of German foreignizing translation, then, the translator enables the German-language reader to understand the individuality of the foreign author so as to identify with him, thereby concealing the transindividual, German-language ideologies – cultural (literary elitism), class (bourgeois minority), national (“German”) – that mediate the foreignizing representation of the foreign author. Such thinking about language and subjectivity is clearly more consistent with domesticating translation, oriented towards conformity with receiving cultural values, and so can do little to question the dominance of transparent discourse in translation today. On the contrary, Schleiermacher’s psychologization of the text assumes transparency, the illusory presence of the foreign author in the translation.

There is another kind of thinking in his lecture that runs counter to this idealist strain, even if impossibly caught in its tangles: a recognition of the cultural and social conditions of language and a projection of a translation practice that takes them into account instead of working to conceal them. Schleiermacher sees translation as an everyday fact of life, not merely an activity performed on literary and philosophical texts, but necessary for intersubjective understanding, active in the very process of communication, because language is determined by various differences – cultural, social, historical:

For not only are the dialects spoken by different tribes belonging to the same nation, and the different stages of the same language or dialect in different centuries, different languages in the strict sense of the word; moreover even contemporaries who are not separated by dialects, but merely belong to different classes, which are not often linked through social intercourse and are far apart in education, often can understand each other only by means of a similar mediation.

(Lefevere 1977: 68)

This observation clearly requires Schleiermacher to revise his nationalist concept of “the spirit of the language”; he understands it as “the repository of a system of observations and shades of mood,” but this is too monolithic and too psychologistic to admit the concept of “different classes,” a social hierarchy of cultural discourses, each so distinctively class-coded as to impede communication. Schleiermacher even finds it “inevitable that different opinions should develop as to” the ways of producing foreignizing effects in translation, “different schools, so to speak, will arise among the masters, and different parties among the audience as followers of those schools,” but he ultimately individualizes the “different points of view,” reducing them to the translator’s consciousness, transforming cultural practices with social implications into self-centered eccentricities: “each one in itself will always be of relative and subjective value only” (ibid.: 81).

It is cultural difference, however, that guides Schleiermacher’s prescriptions for the foreignizing translator, for the invention of discursive peculiarities to signify the foreignness of the foreign text. The translator must reject the kind of language that is used most widely in the receiving culture, what he calls the “alltöglich” (227), familiar or ordinary usage,⁶ refusing “the most universally appealing beauty each genre is capable of” and instead risking the compassionate smile of “the greatest experts and masters who could not understand his laborious and ill-considered German if they did not supplement it with their Greek and Latin” (79). Once again, the cultural difference marked by Schleiermacher’s foreignizing translator runs between an educated elite and the uneducated majority: when the translator bends his language to a foreign likeness, he is not doing it with “each genre,” “universally,” but with literary and scholarly texts in Greek and Latin, so that only “experts and masters” will be able to “understand” his deviant language. Schleiermacher’s translator avoids familiar usage, unlearned language, popular literary forms.

And yet, despite the questionable ideological determinations of Schleiermacher’s lecture – its bourgeois individualism and cultural elitism, its Prussian nationalism and German universalism – it does contain the (inadvertent) suggestion that foreignizing translation can alter the social divisions figured in these ideologies, can promote cultural change through its work on the translating language:

every freely thinking, mentally self-employed human being shapes his own language. For in what other way – except precisely by means of these influences – would it have developed and grown from its first raw state to its more perfect elaboration in scholarship and art? In this sense, therefore, it is the living power of the individual which creates new forms by means of the plastic material of language, at first only for the immediate purpose of communicating a passing consciousness; yet now more, now less of it remains behind in the language, is taken up by others, and reaches out, a shaping force.

(Lefevere 1977: 71)

This passage reverses its logic. At first language is taken to exist in an unmediated “raw state,” worked by a transcendental subject who “shapes his own language,” who is the origin of linguistic and cultural innovation and development. By the end, however, the determinate nature of language emerges as the “shaping force” of subjects. In the interval, the materiality of language is socialized: no longer “raw,” it contains “new forms” invented by “the individual,” but exceeding the function they were intended to serve, the communication of “consciousness,” because they have been derived from preexisting forms used by “others.” This indicates that subjectivity is neither self-originating nor the origin of language and culture, that its cultural values (e.g. “scholarship and art”) are pregiven and constantly reworked (“elaboration”), and that therefore the subject can be considered self-determining only insofar as it ranks these values – or revises them and alters an established ranking. The discursive innovations and deviations introduced by foreignizing translation are thus a potential threat to receiving cultural values, but they perform their revisionary work only from within, developing translation strategies from the diverse discourses that circulate in the translating language.

Schleiermacher’s concept of foreignizing translation constitutes a resistance to dominant cultural values in German at the start of the nineteenth century. The foreign in foreignizing translation then meant a specific selection of foreign texts (literary, philosophical, scholarly) and a development of discursive peculiarities that opposed both French cultural hegemony, especially among the aristocracy, and the literary discourses favored by the largest segment of readers, both middle- and working-class. Schleiermacher's translation project depends on an idealist concept of literature that is at once elitist and nationalist, individualistic yet socially determinate, defined in opposition to capitalist economic practices: "the interpreter plies his trade in the field of commerce; the translator proper operates mainly in the fields of art and scholarship" (Lefevere 1977: 68).

It is this ideological ensemble that must be jettisoned in any revival of foreignizing translation to intervene against the contemporary ascendancy of transparent discourse. Today, transparency is the dominant discourse in poetry and prose, fiction and non-fiction, bestsellers and print journalism. Even if the electronic media have gradually weakened the economic, political, and cultural hegemony of print in the post-World War II period, the idealist concept of literature that underwrites that discourse continues to enjoy considerable institutional power, housed not only in the academy and in the literary cultures of various educated elites, but in the publishing industry and the mass-audience periodical press. The distinction that Schleiermacher perceived between the field of commerce and the fields of art and scholarship has been eroded – if it ever existed as more than a fiction designed to consolidate literature as a transcendental cultural concept. Transparent discourse is eminently consumable in the contemporary cultural marketplace, which in turn influences publishing decisions to exclude foreign texts that preempt transparency.

Schleiermacher shows that the first opportunity to produce a foreignizing effect occurs in the choice of foreign text, wherein the translator can resist dominant discourses in British and American cultures by restoring excluded or marginal texts and possibly reforming the canon of foreign literatures in English. Schleiermacher also suggests that foreignizing translation puts to work a particular discursive strategy, close adherence to the foreign text in conjunction with an avoidance of the most familiar language in the receiving culture. "The more closely the translation follows the turns taken by the original," he observes, "the more foreign it will seem to the reader" (Lefevere 1977: 78). To be sure, whether this strategy can be applied to foreign texts in every humanistic genre in every cultural situation, regardless of their themes or arguments, seems doubtful. Schleiermacher's concepts and practices respond to a specific historical moment, although they are not themselves historicist; hence any application or further development of them must take into account the moment when a translation is produced or studied. Nonetheless, Schleiermacher's recommendations possess an undeniable practical value: they oppose the foregrounding of the signified by which fluent translation produces the effect of transparency; for him, a translation can be foreignizing only by approximating the play of foreign signifiers, and this can take various forms, including experimentation with language that is intelligible but less widely used, especially in translations, as well as close adherence to the foreign text.

Schleiermacher's lecture provides the tools for conceptualizing and enacting a revolt against the dominance of transparent discourse in current English-language translation. Yet the effects of this dominance have included, not only the widespread implementation of fluent strategies, but the marginalization of texts in the history of translation that can yield alternative theories and practices – like Schleiermacher's lecture. With rare exceptions, English-language theorists and practitioners of English-language translation have neglected Schleiermacher. His lecture has been recognized as a key “modern” statement in translation theory only recently, and it was not translated into English until 1977.⁷ And even the author of that first translation, André Lefevere, felt compelled to question Schleiermacher's value: “his requirement that the translation should ‘give the feel’ of the source language must [...] strike us increasingly as odd” (Lefevere 1977: 67). Lefevere argued that translation should be domesticating, as “most theoreticians” recommended, and he specifically referred to Eugene Nida's version of this theory, quoting Nida to criticize Schleiermacher:

In effect, we are faced here with a not-illogical and very spirited defence of what we know now as “translationese” or, with another phrase: “static equivalence,” and which is still very much with us, in spite of the fact that most theoreticians would now subscribe to the concept of dynamic equivalence, which “aims at complete naturalness of expression and tries to relate the receptor to modes of behavior relevant within the context of his own culture.”

(Lefevere 1981: 11)⁸

Schleiermacher's concept of foreignizing translation seems odd to Lefevere only because the latter prefers to submit to the contemporary regime of fluency – in Nida's words, “complete naturalness of expression.” The canonicity of fluent translation after World War II coincides with the emergence of the term “translationese” to designate unidiomatic language in a translated text (OED). Lefevere approves of Nida's “dynamic equivalence,” a concept that now, with the increasing recognition of Schleiermacher's importance, must be viewed as an egregious euphemism for the domesticating translation practice and the cultural political agendas it conceals. Because this practice is so entrenched in English-language translation, Lefevere is unable to see that the detection of unidiomatic language, especially in literary texts, is culturally specific: what is unidiomatic in one cultural formation can be aesthetically effective in another. Any dismissive treatment of Schleiermacher maintains the forms of domestication in English-language translation today, hindering reflection on how different translation practices can resist the questionable values that dominate British and American cultures. Schleiermacher can indeed offer a way out.

2 The Newman–Arnold controversy

With Schleiermacher's lecture untranslated, however, this way was open to few English-language translators during the nineteenth century. A translator could of course formulate a theory of foreignizing translation, whether or not inspired by the German tradition, but the theory would be a response to a peculiarly English situation, motivated by different cultural and political interests. Such was the case with Francis Newman (1805–97), the accomplished brother of the cardinal. In the 1850s, Newman challenged the main line of English-language translation, arguing that "Cowper's attempt to translate Homer had proved as great a failure as Pope's" and suggesting that "a sensible change is taking place, from our recent acquaintance with the extent to which the Germans have carried poetical translation" (Newman 1851: 371).⁹ This "acquaintance" with the German tradition apparently made Newman the first in a small group of Victorian translators who developed a foreignizing translation practice and opposed the English regime of fluent domestication.

A classical scholar who taught for many years, first at Manchester New College, then University College, London, Newman was a prolific writer on a variety of topics, some scholarly, others religious, many of urgent social concern. He produced commentaries on classical texts (Aeschylus, Euripides) and dictionaries and vocabularies for Oriental languages and dialects (Arabic, Libyan). He wrote a spiritual autobiography and many religious treatises that reflected his own wavering belief in Christianity and the heterodox nature of that belief (e.g. Hebrew Theism: The Common Basic of Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism). And he issued a steady stream of lectures, essays, and pamphlets that demonstrated his intense involvement in a wide range of political issues. Newman argued for decentralized government, land nationalization, women's suffrage, the abolition of slavery. He criticized English colonialism, recommending government reforms that would allow the colonized to enter the political process. His Essays on Diet advocated vegetarianism, and on several occasions he supported state enforcement of sobriety, partly as a means of curbing prostitution.

The ideological configuration of Newman's writing uneasily combined liberalism with a paternalistic investment in bourgeois moral values, and this also played into his translation projects, which were fundamentally pedagogical and populist. He published Latin versions of the popular literature he assigned to his students for class translation exercises: Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's narrative poem Hiawatha (1862) and Daniel Defoe's novel Robinson Crusoe (1884). The readership he imagined for his translations of Horace (1853) and the Iliad (1856) did not know Latin and Greek or were too busy or bored to maintain languages they learned at university – in Newman's words, "the unlearned English reader," "those who seek solely for amusement, including men of business, commercial England," but also the socially diverse audience of "Dickens and Thackeray" (Newman 1853: iii–v). Compared to Schleiermacher, Newman enlisted translation in a more democratic cultural politics, assigned a pedagogical function but pitched deliberately against an academic elite. For Newman, the aim of education was to foster liberal democracy. In his lecture On the Relations of Free Knowledge to Moral Sentiment, he argued that the study of “political economy” teaches a respect for cultural differences that militates against imperialism, nationalism, and class domination:

political economy has demonstrated that the laws which morality would dictate as just are also the laws of physical well being for nations and for classes; that no cunning regulations will enable a State to prosper at the expense of foreigners; and that the interests of classes and of nations are so knit up, that one cannot permanently be depressed without injury to others. It rescues the patriot from the temptation of being unjust to the foreigner, by proving that that does not conduce to the welfare of his own people.

(Newman 1847b: 18–19)

Newman similarly urged the study of history, literary as well as political, because it can “deepen our knowledge of mankind, and our insight into social and political interests” (ibid.: 8). Here too the “practical uses” of this knowledge required the recognition of cultural differences. In Four Lectures on the Contrasts of Ancient and Modern History, Newman granted the central metaphysical assumption of Enlightenment humanism – “The whole interest of History depends upon the eternal likeness of human nature to itself” – but only to give it a more materialist revision, mindful of historical change: “it is equally needful to be aware of the points at which similarity ceases, and contrast begins; otherwise our applications of history to practical uses will be mere delusive pedantry” (Newman 1847a: 5–6).

Newman’s “practical” concept of education led him to criticize academic specialization because it decreased the social value of knowledge. In his Introductory Lecture to the Classical Course at Manchester New College, he asserted that we do not advocate any thing exclusive. A one-sided cultivation may appear at first like carrying out the principle of division of labour, yet in fact it does not tend even to the general benefit and progress of truth, much less to the advantage of the individual.

(Newman 1841: 7)

Although intended to justify the place of classics in an academic curriculum, Newman’s lecture attacked the scholarly disdain of translation, describing it as mere snobbery that ironically degraded classical literature by limiting its audience: “It would be no honor to the venerable productions of antiquity, to imagine that all their excellencies vanish with translation, and only a mean exclusiveness of spirit could grudge to impart as much as possible of their instruction to the unlearned” (ibid.: 9). To Newman, “exclusive” meant specialized, but also elitist.

It seems clear that only foreignizing translation could answer to Newman's concept of liberal education, to his concern with the recognition of cultural differences. His introductory lecture argued that literary texts were particularly important in staging this recognition because "literature is special, peculiar; it witnesses, and it tends to uphold, national diversity" (Newman 1841: 10). In the preface to his version of the Iliad, he offered a concise account of his translation practice by contrasting it with the "principles which I regard to be utterly false and ruinous to translation." The principles Newman opposed belonged to the domesticating practice that dominated English translation since the seventeenth century:

One of these is, that the reader ought, if possible, to forget that it is a translation at all, and be lulled into the illusion that he is reading an original work. Of course a necessary inference from such a dogma is, that whatever has a foreign colour is undesirable and is even a grave defect. The translator, it seems, must carefully obliterate all that is characteristic of the original, unless it happens to be identical in spirit to something already familiar in English. From such a notion I cannot too strongly express my intense dissent. I am at precisely the opposite; – to retain every peculiarity of the original, so far as I am able, with the greater care the more foreign it may happen to be, – whether it be a matter of taste, of intellect, or of morals. [...] the English translator should desire the reader always to remember that his work is an imitation, and moreover is in a different material; that the original is foreign, and in many respects extremely unlike our native compositions.

For Newman, the "illusion" of originality that confused the translation with the foreign text was domesticating, assimilating what was foreign "to something already familiar in English." He recommended a translation practice that signified the many differences between the translation and the foreign text, their relative autonomy from one another, their composition in different languages for different cultures. Yet rejecting the illusion of originality meant opposing the discourse that shapes most of "our native compositions" – transparency based on the current standard dialect to insure easy readability. Newman felt that his translations were resisting a contemporary standardization of English enforced by the publishing industry:

In the present day, so intensely mechanical is the apparatus of prose-composition, – when editors and correctors of the press desire the uniform observance of some one rule (never mind what, so that you find it in the "standard" grammar), – every deviation is resented as a vexatious eccentricity; and in general it would appear, that dry perspicuity is the only excellence for which the grammarian has struggled. Every expression which does not stand the logical test, however transparent the meaning, however justified by analogies, is apt to be condemned; and every difference of mind and mind, showing itself in the style, is deprecated.

(Ibid.: xvii–xviii)

Since Newman developed his foreignizing practice in the translation of classical texts, for him foreignizing necessarily involved a nonstandard form that signified historical remoteness – archaism. In the preface to his selection from Horace, he faulted previous English versions because they modernized the Latin text: “Hitherto our poetical translators have failed in general, not so much from want of talent or learning, but from aiming to produce poems in modern style, through an excessive fear that a modern reader will endure nothing else” (Newman 1853: iv). In the preface to his Iliad, Newman defined more precisely the sort of archaism Homer required. Partly it was an effort to suggest a historical analogy between earlier forms of Greek and English: “The entire dialect of Homer being essentially archaic, that of a translation ought to be as much Saxo-Norman as possible, and owe as little as possible to the elements thrown into our language by classical learning” (Newman 1856: vi). Homer’s “style” required a like solution: “it is similar to the old English ballad, and is in sharp contrast to the polished style of Pope, Sotheby, and Cowper, the best known English translators of Homer” (ibid.: iv).

Yet Newman also made clear that he was “not concerned with the historical problem, of writing in a style which actually existed at an earlier period in our language; but with the artistic problem of attaining a plausible aspect of moderate antiquity, while remaining easily intelligible” (Newman 1856: x). Hence he advocated an artificially constructed archaism, patched together without an excessive regard for historical accuracy or consistency, producing an effect that he called “quaint” as opposed to “grotesque.” And he made this verbal choice on various levels, in the lexicon, syntax, and prosody of his translations. He explained his use of syntactical “inversions,” for example, as “not mere metrical expedients, but necessities of the style; partly, to attain antiquity and elevation, partly for emphasis or for variety” (ibid.: xi).

Newman’s translations could only be foreignizing in a culturally specific sense, in relation to concepts of “domestic” and “foreign” that distinguished English literary culture in the Victorian period. Thus he saw nothing inconsistent in faulting the modernizing tendencies of previous Horace translators while he himself expurgated the Latin text, inscribing it with an English sense of moral propriety. This is where Newman’s bourgeois paternalism contradicts the democratic tendencies of his populism:

I have striven to make this book admissible to the purest-minded English lady, and could never consent to add adornment to a single line of corrupting tendency. It exhibits, no doubt, mournful facts concerning the relations of the sexes in Augustan Rome, – facts not in themselves so shocking, as many which oppress the heart in the cities of Christendom; and this, I think, it is instructive to perceive. Only in a few instances, where the immorality is too ugly to be instructive, have I abruptly cut away the difficulty. In general, Horace aimed at a higher beauty than did Catullus or Propertius or Ovid, and the result of a purer taste is closely akin to that of a sounder morality.

What was foreignizing about Newman's translations was not their morality, but their literary discourse, the strangeness of the archaism. This too was homegrown, a rich stew drawn from various periods of English, but it deviated from current usage and cut across various literary discourses, poetry and the novel, elite and popular, English and Scottish. Newman's Horace translation contained "viands," for example, a word that surfaced at the beginning of the fifteenth century and was used extensively in the early modern period in various kinds of writing, literary (Shakespeare's plays) and nonliterary (Edward Hall's historical chronicles). Yet it was also used later as a distinctly poetic form, a poeticism, in widely read Victorian writers like Tennyson and Dickens.¹⁰ Newman's archaic lexicon crossed, not only historical periods, but contemporary reading constituencies. The word "eld" appeared in his Horace translation after a succession of different uses – in Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812), Sir Walter Scott's The Monastery (1820), Longfellow's Evangeline (1847).

Newman's version of the Iliad increased the density of the archaism, so that what may have been a recognizable poeticism now risked opacity and reader incomprehension. As if anticipating this risk, Newman appended a two-page "glossary" to the translation that provided his definitions for the archaic words. The glossary was a scholarly gesture that indicated the sheer heterogeneity of his lexicon, its diverse literary origins, and his readers no doubt found it useful when they took up other books, in various genres, periods, dialects. Newman used "callant" ("a young man"), an eighteenth-century word that appeared in Scott's Waverley (1814), and "gride" ("to cut gratingly"), a Spenserianism that appeared in Shelley's Prometheus Bound (1821) and Tennyson's In Memoriam (1850). A brief catalogue suggests the inventiveness of Newman's lexicon, its historical and cultural breadth, but also its occasional impenetrability: "behight," "bragly" ("braw, proudly fine"), "bulkin" ("calf"), "choler," "emprize," "fain," "gramsome" ("direful"), "hie," "lief," "noisome," "ravin," "sith," "whilom," "wight," "wendl." There were even some Scottish words drawn from Burns and Scott, like "skirl," meaning "to cry shrilly," and "syne," as in "lang syne" ("long ago").

The foreignizing effects of Newman's translations definitely registered on contemporary readers. The London Quarterly Review included Newman's Horace in two review essays that surveyed English versions of the odes, past and present. Although these essays were published more than fifteen years apart (1858 and 1874), they both disapproved of Newman's strategies and expressed a preference for a modernized Horace, rendered in immediately intelligible English:

It is an all-pervading and persistent fault in this translation, that obscure and antiquated forms of expression are used, instead of simple and modern English. Thus we find, in the very first Ode, such expressions as “Lydian eld,” “quirital mob.” Elsewhere we find such phrases as “tangled fields” (whatever this means), “the sage thrice-aged.”

(London Quarterly Review 1874: 17)

This was a criticism that crossed political lines, appearing not only in the Tory London Quarterly, but the liberal National Review, to which Newman was a contributor (Sullivan 1984: 237–42). The reviewer of Newman’s Iliad for the National expressed some agreement with him, admitting that “a style in some sort archaic is no doubt desirable, and even necessary, to represent a poet such as Homer” (National Review 1860: 292). But Newman’s archaism was attacked for deviating too far from the familiar, the transparent:

we cannot but consider that Mr. Newman’s diction is needlessly antiquated and uncouth; and that, although he has not admitted any expressions which are unintelligible from their antiquity, he has omitted to observe the further caution, that archaism should not appear plainly to be constrained or assumed, lest a laboured, artificial style of English should suggest the idea of a laboured, artificial style of Greek, than which nothing can be more opposite to Homer.

(Ibid.: 292)

The reviewer preferred a reading experience that allowed the English version to pass as a true equivalent of “Homer” while repressing the status of Newman’s text as a translation, the sense that the archaism was calculated by the translator, “assumed.”

As this passage suggests, however, Newman’s translations seemed foreign, not only because their “strained archaic quaintness” preempted the illusion of transparency, but also because they constituted a reading of the foreign text that revised prevailing critical opinion. Newman’s decision to translate Horace into unrhymed verse with various accentual meters ignored what the London Quarterly Review called “the dignity and the music of the Latin,” “the grace and sweetness of the original” (London Quarterly Review 1858: 192; 1874: 18). As a result, Newman’s version appeared “somewhat quaint and harsh,” whereas “the rhymed versions of Lord Ravensworth and of Mr. Theodore Martin” possessed “the qualities of easy elegance, of sweetness of cadence” (London Quarterly Review 1858: 192–3; 1874: 16, 19). The reviewers looked for a smooth, iconic rhythm, sound imitating sense to produce a transparent poem, but they also assumed that Horace would have agreed:

Now and then Professor Newman surprises us with a grateful [sic] flow of verse: –

“Me not the enduring Sparta
 Nor fertile-soil’d Larissa’s plain
 So to the heart has smitten
 As Anio headlong tumbling, Loud-brawling Albunea’s grot,
 Tiburnus’ groves and orchards
 With restless rivulets streaming.”

There is something of the rush of cool waters here. But what would Horace say, if he could come to life, and find himself singing the two stanzas subjoined? –

“Well of Bandusia, as crystal bright, Luscious wine to thee with flowers is due;
 To-morrow shall a kid
 Thine become, who with horny front
 Budding new, designs amours and war.
 Vainly: since this imp o’ the frisky herd
 With life-blood’s scarlet gush
 Soon shall curdle thy icy pool.”

This is hard to read, while the Latin is as pleasant to the ear as the fountain which it brings before us to the imagination.

(London Quarterly Review 1858: 193)

The reviewers’ negative evaluations rested on a contradiction that revealed quite clearly the receiving cultural values they privileged. In calling for a rhymed version, they inscribed the unrhymed Latin text with the verse form that dominated current English poetry while insisting that rhyme made the translation closer to Horace. The reviewers were articulating a hegemonic position in English literary culture, definitely slanted towards an academic elite: Horace’s text can be “pleasant to the ear” only for readers of Latin. Yet this academic reading was also presented in national cultural terms, with the reviewers assimilating Horace to traditional English prosody:

To discard the old machinery of recurrent rhymes, which has grown with the growth and strengthened with the strength of our poetical language, to set aside the thousand familiar and expected effects of beat, and pause, and repetition, and of the modulation of measure-sound that makes the everchanging charm of lyrical verse – to set aside all this for the disappointing, unfamiliar machinery of verses, each with a different ending, unrelieved by any new grace of expression, any new harmony of sound, is simply the work of a visionary, working not for the enjoyment of his readers, but the gratification of a crotchety and perverted taste.

This call for a domesticated Horace was motivated by a nationalist investment in “the strength of our poetical language.” Newman’s version was “perverted” because it was un-English: “to have to break up all our English traditions for something utterly novel and yet mediocre, is a severe demand to make from the great public which reads for pleasure” (London Quarterly Review 1858: 193). Newman tested the reviewers’ assumption that the English reading audience wanted every foreign text to be rewritten according to dominant literary values. Yet the very heterogeneity of his translations, their borrowings from various literary genres and discourses, gave the lie to this assumption by pointing to the equally heterogeneous nature of the audience. Newman’s foreignizing texts were challenging an elitist concept of a national English culture.

The cultural force of his challenge can be gauged from the reception of his Iliad. Newman’s foreignizing practice led him to choose the ballad as the archaic English form most suitable to Homeric verse. And this choice embroiled him in a midcentury controversy over the prosody of Homeric translations, played out both in numerous reviews and essays and in a spate of English versions with the most different verse forms: rhymed and unrhymed, ballad meter and Spenserian stanza, hendecasyllabics and hexameters. Here too the stakes were at once cultural – competing readings of the Greek texts – and political – competing concepts of the English nation.

Newman used ballad meter for his Iliad because he sought “a poetry which aims to be antiquated and popular” (Newman 1856: xii). “The style of Homer,” he argued, “is direct, popular, forcible, quaint, flowing, garrulous, abounding with formulas, redundant in particles and affirmatory interjections, as also in grammatical connectives of time, place, and argument” (ibid.: iv). In line with Friedrich August Wolf’s theories of oral transmission in his Prolegomena ad Homerum (1795), Newman defined the “popular” aspect of the Greek text historically, as the product of an oral archaic culture at a rudimentary level of literary development, “a stage of the national mind in which divisions of literature were not recognized[,] even the distinction of prose and poetry” (ibid.; Jenkins 1980: 197–8). But he also located contemporary “popular” analogues, English as well as Greek. In choosing the ballad, Newman recalled, “I found with pleasure that I had exactly alighted on the metre which the modern Greeks adopt for the Homeric hexameter” in what he called “the modern Greek epic” (ibid.: vii–viii). The texts in question were actually ballads sung by nineteenth-century mountain brigands in the Peloponnese, “Klephts,” who fought in the Greek resistance against the Turkish Empire.¹¹

The English analogues Newman cited were equally “modern” – contemporary versions of archaic forms. He argued that “our real old ballad-writers are too poor and mean to represent Homer, and are too remote in diction from our times to be popularly intelligible” (Newman 1856: x). To secure this “popular” intelligibility, his translation reflected the archaism in the English historical novel and narrative poem: he thought Scott would have been an ideal translator of Homer.

Yet Newman's discourse was also explicitly oral, unlearned, and English. His syntactical inversions approximated current English speech:

in all lively conversation we use far more inversion than in the style of essay-writing; putting the accusative before the verb, beginning a sentence with a predicate or with a negative, and in other ways approaching to the old style, which is truly native to every genuine Englishman.

(Ibid.: xi)

This was a concept of "the old style" that was nationalist as well as populist. Newman's "Saxo-Norman" lexicon "owe[d] as little as possible to the elements thrown into our language by classical learning" (ibid.: vi). And the "several old-fashioned formulas" he used opposed academic prescriptions for English usage:

In modern style, our classical scholars at an early period introduced from Latin a principle which seems to me essentially unpopular, viz., to end a clause with than he, than thou, than she, &c., where they think a nominative is needed. [...] I cannot listen to unsophisticated English talk, without being convinced that in old English the words me, thee, him, &c., are not merely accusatives, but are also the isolated form of the pronoun, like moi, toi, lui. In reply to the question, "Who is there?" every English boy or girl answers Me, until he or she is scolded into saying I. In modern prose the Latinists have prevailed; but in a poetry which aims to be antiquated and popular, I must rebel.

The "popular" in Newman's translation was a contemporary construction of an archaic form that carried various ideological implications. It drew on an analogous Greek form affiliated with a nationalist movement to win political autonomy from foreign domination (or, more precisely, a criminal fringe of this movement, the Klepht resistance). And it assumed an English culture that was national yet characterized by social divisions, in which cultural values were ranged hierarchically among various groups, academic and nonacademic. Newman's archaism constituted the democratic tendency in his concept of the English nation because it was populist, assigning popular cultural forms a priority over the academic elite that sought to exclude them. He thought of the ballad as "our Common Metre" (Newman 1856: vii).

Newman's Iliad received little attention in the periodicals – until, several years later, Matthew Arnold decided to attack it in a lecture series published as On Translating Homer (1861). Arnold, then Professor of Poetry at Oxford, described the lectures as an effort "to lay down the true principles on which a translation of Homer should be founded," and these were principles diametrically opposed to Newman's (Arnold 1960: 238). Arnold wanted translation to transcend, rather than signify, linguistic and cultural differences, and so he prized the illusionism of transparent discourse, using the “strange language” of mystical transcendence to describe the process of domestication:

Coleridge says, in his strange language, speaking of the union of the human soul with the divine essence, that this takes place

Whene’er the mist, which stands ’twixt God and thee, Defecates to a pure transparency;

and so, too, it may be said of that union of the translator with his original, which alone can produce a good translation, that it takes place when the mist which stands between them – the mist of alien modes of thinking, speaking, and feeling on the translator’s part – “defecates to a pure transparency,” and disappears.

(Ibid.: 103)

In this remarkable analogy, Arnold’s translation “principles” assumed a Christian Platonic metaphysics of true semantic equivalence, whereby he demonized (or fecalized) the material conditions of translation, the translating-language values that define the translator’s work and inevitably mark the source-language text. Current English “modes of thinking, speaking, and feeling” must be repressed, like a bodily function; they are “alien” excrement soiling the classical text. This is an antiquarianism that canonized the Greek past while approaching the English present with a physical squeamishness. Arnold didn’t demonize all English values, however, since he was in fact upholding the canonical tradition of English literary translation: following Denham, Dryden, Tytler, Frere, he recommended a free, domesticating practice to produce fluent, familiar verse that respected bourgeois moral values. The difference between the foreign text and English culture “disappears” in this tradition because the translator removes it – while invisibly inscribing a reading that reflects English literary canons, a specific interpretation of “Homer.” In Arnold’s case:

So essentially characteristic of Homer is his plainness and naturalness of thought, that to the preservation of this in his own version the translator must without scruple sacrifice, where it is necessary, verbal fidelity to his original, rather than run any risk of producing, by literalness, an odd and unnatural effect.

For Arnold, what determined familiarity of effect was not merely transparent discourse, fluency as opposed to “literalness,” but the prevailing academic reading of Homer, validated by scholars at Eton, Cambridge, and Oxford. Indeed, Arnold’s main contention – and the point on which he differed most from Newman – was that only readers of the Greek text were qualified to evaluate English versions of it:

“a competent scholar’s judgment whether the translation more or less reproduces for him the effect of the original” (Arnold 1960: 201). Throughout the lectures Arnold repeatedly set forth this “effect” in authoritative statements: “Homer is rapid in his movement, Homer is plain in his words and style, Homer is simple in his ideas, Homer is noble in manner” (ibid.: 141). Using this explicitly academic reading, Arnold argued that various translators, past and present, “have failed in rendering him”: George Chapman, because of “the fancifulness of the Elizabethan age, entirely alien to the plain directness of Homer’s thought and feeling”; Pope, because of his “literary artificial manner, entirely alien to the plain naturalness of Homer”; William Cowper, because of his “elaborate Miltonic manner, entirely alien to the flowing rapidity of Homer”; and, finally, Newman, whose “manner” was “eminently ignoble, while Homer’s manner is eminently noble” (ibid.: 103). Here it becomes clear that Newman’s translation was foreignizing because his archaism deviated from the academic reading of Homer:

Why are Mr. Newman’s lines faulty? They are faulty, first, because, as a matter of diction, the expressions “O gentle friend,” “eld,” “in sooth,” “hefty,” “advance,” “man-ennobling,” “sith,” “any-gait,” and “sly of foot,” are all bad; some of them worse than others, but all bad: that is, they all of them as here used excite in the scholar, their sole judge, – excite, I will boldly affirm, in Professor Thompson or Professor Jowett, – a feeling totally different from that excited in them by the words of Homer which these expressions profess to render.

Arnold’s critique of Newman’s translation was informed by a concept of English culture that was nationalist as well as elitist. To demonstrate the effect of familiarity that a scholar experiences before the Greek text, Arnold gave examples of English “expressions” that he called “simple,” transparently intelligible, but that also constituted Anglocentric stereotypes of foreign cultures, implicitly racist:

[Greek] expressions seem no more odd to [the scholar] than the simplest expressions in English. He is not more checked by any feeling of strangeness, strong or weak, when he reads them, than when he reads in an English book “the painted savage,” or, “the phlegmatic Dutchman.”

(Ibid.: 123)

In Arnold’s view, Newman’s translation demonstrated the need for an academic elite to establish national cultural values:

I think that in England, partly from the want of an Academy, partly from a national habit of intellect to which that want of an Academy is itself due, there exists too little of what I may call a public force of correct literary opinion, possessing within certain limits a clear sense of what is right and wrong, sound and unsound, and sharply recalling men of ability and learning from any flagrant misdirection of these their advantages. I think, even, that in our country a powerful misdirection of this kind is often more likely to subjugate and pervert opinion than to be checked and corrected by it.

(Ibid.: 171–2)

The social function Arnold assigned translators like Newman was to “correct” English cultural values by bringing them in line with scholarly “opinion.” Translation for Arnold was a means to empower an academic elite, to endow it with national cultural authority, but this empowerment involved an imposition of scholarly values on other cultural constituencies – including the diverse English-reading audience that Newman hoped to reach. The elitism in Arnold’s concept of a national English culture assumed an unbridgeable social division: “These two impressions – that of the scholar, and that of the unlearned reader – can, practically, never be accurately compared” (ibid.: 201). Translation bridges this division, but only by eliminating the nonscholarly.

Arnold’s attack on Newman’s translation was an academic repression of popular cultural forms that was grounded in a competing reading of Homer. Where Arnold’s Homer was elitist, possessing “nobility,” “a great master” of “the grand style,” Newman’s was populist and, to Arnold, “ignoble.” Hence Arnold insisted that the ballad-style and the ballad-measure are eminently inappropriate to render Homer. Homer’s manner and movement are always both noble and powerful: the ballad-manner and movement are often either jaunty and smart, so not noble; or jog-trot and humdrum, so not powerful.

(Arnold 1960: 128)

Arnold rejected the use of the “ballad-manner” in various English translations – Chapman’s Homer, the “Homeric ballads” that Dr William Maginn began publishing in 1838, Newman’s Iliad – because he found it “over-familiar,” “commonplace,” “pitched sensibly lower than Homer’s” verse (ibid.: 117, 124, 155). Newman’s archaism in particular degraded the canonical Greek text by resorting to colloquial Shakespearean expressions, like “To grunt and sweat under a weary load” – a judgment that again revealed the strain of bourgeois squeamishness in Arnold’s academic elitism:

if the translator of Homer [...] were to employ, when he has to speak of one of Homer’s heroes under the load of calamity, this figure of “grunting” and “sweating,” we should say, He Newmanises, and his diction would offend us. For he is to be noble; and no plea of wishing to be plain and natural can get him excused from being this.

(Ibid.: 155)

Arnold's notion of Homer's "nobility" assimilated the Greek text to the scholarly while excluding the popular. He noted that for an American reader the ballad "has a disadvantage in being like the rhythm of the American national air Yankee Doodle, and thus provoking ludicrous associations" (ibid.: 132). And although Arnold recommended the hexameter as the most suitable verse form to secure "the Homeric rapidity," he was careful to distinguish what he had in mind from recent uses of this meter: he preferred neither the "lumbering effect" of Longfellow's "pleasing and popular poem of Evangeline" nor the "too rough and irregular" rhythm of Clough's "serio-comic poem," The Bothie of Toper-na-fuoisch, but rather the hexameters of "the accomplished Provost of Eton, Dr. Hawtrey," who was not only "one of the natural judges of a translation of Homer," but the translator of a passage from the Iliad included in the 1847 volume English Hexameter Translations (ibid.: 153, 151, 150, 149). Any translation was likely to be offensive to Arnold, given his scholarly adulation of the Greek text. Newman's mixture of homely colloquialism, archaism, and close rendering proved positively alienating:

The end of the nineteenth book, the answer of Achilles to his horse Xanthus, Mr. Newman gives thus: –

"Chestnut! why bodest death to me? from thee this was not needed.
Myself right surely know also, that 'tis my doom to perish,
From mother and from father dear apart, in Troy; but never Pause will I make of war, until the Trojans be glutted."
He spake, and yelling, held afront the single-hoofed horses

Here Mr. Newman calls Xanthus Chestnut, indeed, as he calls Balius Spotted, and Podarga Spry-foot; which is as if a Frenchman were to call Miss Nightingale Mdlle. Rossignol, or Mr. Bright M. Clair. And several other expressions, too, "yelling," "held afront," "single-hoofed," leave, to say the very least, much to be desired.

(Ibid.: 134)

It is in fact Arnold's habit of saying "the very least" that is most symptomatic of the anti-democratic tendency in his critique. Arnold refused to define his concept of "nobleness," the one Homeric quality that distinguished the academic reading and justified his call for a national academy: "I do not attempt to lay down any rules for obtaining this effect of nobleness, – the effect, too, of all others the most impalpable, the most irreducible to rule, and which most depends on the individual personality of the artist" (Arnold 1960: 159). Like Alexander Tytler, Arnold valued a public sphere of cultural consensus that would underwrite the "correct" translation discourse for Homer, but any democratic tendency in this national agenda foundered on an individualist aesthetics that was fundamentally impressionistic: "the presence or absence of the grand style can only be spiritually discerned" (ibid.: 136). Unlike Tytler, Arnold could not easily accept a humanist assumption of universal "reason and good sense" because the English reading audience had become too culturally and socially diverse; hence Arnold's turn to an academic elite to enforce its cultural agenda on the nation. As Terry Eagleton puts it, "Arnold's academy is not the public sphere, but a means of defense against the actual Victorian public" (Eagleton 1984: 64; see also Baldick 1983: 29–31).

The "grand style" was so important to Arnold because it was active in the construction of human subjects, capable of imprinting other social groups with academic cultural values: "it can form the character, it is edifying. [...] the few artists in the grand style [...] can refine the raw natural man, they can transmute him" (Arnold 1960: 138–9). Yet because Homeric nobleness depended on the individual personality of the writer or reader and could only be experienced, not described, it was autocratic and irrational. The individualism at the root of Arnold's critique finally undermines the cultural authority he assigned to the academy by issuing into contradiction: he vaguely linked nobility to the individual personality, but he also faulted Newman's translation precisely because of its individualism. For Arnold, Newman indulged "some individual fancy," exemplifying a deplorable national trait, "the great defect of English intellect, the great blemish of English literature" – "eccentricity and arbitrariness" (ibid.: 140).

Newman was stung by Arnold's lectures, and by the end of the year he published a book-length reply that allowed him to develop more fully the translation rationale he sketched in his preface. At the outset he made quite clear that his "sole object is, to bring Homer before the unlearned public" (Newman 1861: 6). Newman questioned the authority Arnold assigned to the academy in the formation of a national culture. He pointed out that England was multicultural, a site of diverse values, and although an academic himself he sided with the nonacademic:

Scholars are the tribunal of Erudition, but of Taste the educated but unlearned public is the only rightful judge; and to it I wish to appeal. Even scholars collectively have no right, and much less have single scholars, to pronounce a final sentence on questions of taste in their court.

(Ibid.: 2)

Because Newman translated for a different audience, he refused such scholarly verse forms as the hexameters Arnold proposed:

The unlearned look on all, even the best hexameters, whether from Southey, Lockhart or Longfellow, as odd and disagreeable prose. Mr. Arnold deprecates appeal to popular taste: well he may! Yet if the unlearned are to be our audience, we cannot defy them. I myself, before venturing to print, sought to ascertain how unlearned women and children would accept my verses. I could boast how children and half-educated women have extolled them; how greedily a working man has inquired for them, without knowing who was the translator.

(Ibid.: 12–13)

Newman's assessment of "popular taste" led him to write his translation in the ballad form, which he described in terms that obviously sought to challenge Arnold's: "It is essentially a noble metre, a popular metre, a metre of great capacity. It is essentially the national ballad metre" (ibid.: 22). Newman's reply emphasized the peculiar ideological significance of his project. His aim to produce a translation that was at once populist and nationalist was realized in an archaic literary discourse that resisted any scholarly domestication of the foreign text, any assimilation of it to the regime of transparent discourse in English:

Classical scholars ought to set their faces against the double heresy; of trying to enforce, that foreign poetry, however various, shall all be rendered in one English dialect, and that this shall, in order of words and in diction, closely approximate to polished prose.

(Ibid.: 88)

Newman's reply showed that translation could permit other, popular literary discourses to emerge in English only if it was foreignizing, or, in the case of classical literature, historicizing, only if it abandoned the prevailing notion of fluency to signify "the archaic, the rugged, the boisterous element in Homer" (Newman 1861: 22). Because Newman's historiography was essentially Whiggish, assuming a teleological model of human development, a liberal concept of progress, he felt that Homer "not only was antiquated, relatively to Pericles, but is also absolutely antique, being a poet of a barbarian age" (ibid.: 48).¹² Newman admitted that it was difficult to avoid judging past foreign cultures according to the cultural values – both academic and bourgeois – that distinguished Victorian elites from their social inferiors in England and elsewhere. He believed that if the living Homer could sing his lines to us, they would at first move in us the same pleasing interest as an elegant and simple melody from an African of the Gold Coast; but that, after hearing twenty lines, we should complain of meagreness, sameness, and loss of moral expression; and should judge the style to be as inferior to our own oratorical metres, as the music of Pindar to our third-rate modern music.

(Ibid.: 14)

Yet Newman nonetheless insisted that such Anglocentric judgments must be minimized or avoided altogether: "to expect refinement and universal delicacy of expression in that stage of civilization is quite anachronistic and unreasonable" (ibid.: 73). In arguing for a historicist approach to translation, Newman demonstrated that scholarly English critics like Arnold violated their own principle of universal reason by using it to justify an abridgement of the Greek text:

Homer never sees things in the same proportions as we see them. To omit his digressions, and what I may call his "impertinences," in order to give his argument that which Mr. Arnold is pleased to call the proper “balance,” is to value our own logical minds, more than his picturesque but illogical mind.

(Ibid.: 56)

As such statements suggest, the Whig historiography that informed Newman’s concept of classical culture inevitably privileged Victorian social elites as exemplars of the most advanced stage of human development. As a result, it implicitly drew an analogy among their inferiors – the “barbarian,” the “savage,” the colonized (“Gold Coast”), and the popular English audience – exposing a patronizing and potentially racist side to Newman’s translation populism (and edging his position closer to Arnold’s). Yet Newman’s Whig historiography also enabled him to refine his sense of literary history and develop a translation project that both signalled the cultural differences of the foreign text and acknowledged the diversity of English literary discourses: “Every sentence of Homer was more or less antiquated to Sophocles, who could no more help feeling at every instant the foreign and antiquated character of the poetry, than an Englishman can help feeling the same in reading Burns’s poems” (Newman 1861: 35–6). Newman’s skepticism towards dominant cultural values in English even made him criticize Arnold’s admitted “Bibliolatry,” his reliance on “the authority of the Bible” in developing a lexicon for Homeric translations (Arnold 1960: 165–6). Newman didn’t want the Bible’s cultural authority to exclude other archaic literary discourses, which he considered equally “sacred”: “Words which have come to us in a sacred connection, no doubt, gain a sacred hue, but they must not be allowed to desecrate other old and excellent words” (Newman 1861: 89).

The publication of Arnold’s lectures made Homeric translation an important topic of debate in British and American literary cultures, provoking not only a reply from Newman and a coda from Arnold, but many reviews and articles in a wide range of periodicals. The reception was mixed. Reviewers were especially divided on the question of whether the ballad or the hexameter was the acceptable verse form for Homeric translation.¹³ Yet Arnold was definitely favored over Newman, no matter what ideological standpoint the periodical may have established in previous reviewing. The Edinburgh-based North British Review, although “consistently Whiggish in politics,” possessed a religious and moral conservatism that led to an evangelical approach in literary reviews – and an endorsement of Arnold’s call for an academy with national cultural authority (North British Review 1862: 348; Sullivan 1984: 276). In an article that discussed recent Homeric translations and the Arnold-Newman controversy, the reviewer accepted Arnold’s diagnosis of English culture as well as his dismissal of Newman’s archaism: “at present we have nothing but eccentricity, and arbitrary likings and dislikings. Our literature shows no regard for dignity, no reverence for law. [...] The present ballad-mania is among the results of this licentiousness” (North British Review 1862: 348).

Arnold’s case against Newman was persuasive even to the Westminster Review, which abandoned its characteristically militant liberalism to advocate a cultural elite (Sullivan 1983b: 424–33). The reviewer remarked that lecturing in English instead of Latin gave Arnold “the further privilege and responsibility of addressing himself not to the few, but to the many, not to a select clique of scholars, but to the entire reading public” (Westminster Review 1862: 151). Yet it was precisely the literary values of a select scholarly clique that the reviewer wanted to be imposed on the entire reading public, since he accepted Arnold’s “proposed test of a thoroughly good translation – that it ought to produce on the scholar the same effect as the original poem” (ibid.: 151). Hence Arnold’s academic reading of the Greek text was recommended over Newman’s populist “view that Homer can be rendered adequately into any form of ballad-metre. All ballad-metre alike is pitched in too low a key; it may be rapid, and direct, and spirit-stirring, but is incapable of sustained nobility” (ibid.: 165).

Not every reviewer agreed with Arnold on the need for an academic elite to establish a national English culture. But most explicitly shared his academic reading of Homer and therefore his criticism of Newman’s archaic translation. The Saturday Review, advocate of a conservative liberalism opposed to democratic reform (the labor union movement, women’s suffrage, socialism), affected a condescending air of impartiality by criticizing both Arnold and Newman (Bevington 1941). Yet the criteria were mostly Arnoldian. The reviewer assumed the cultural superiority of the academy by chastizing Arnold for violating scholarly decorum, for devoting Oxford lectures to a “bitterly contemptuous” attack on a contemporary writer like Newman, “who, whatever his aberrations in other ways, has certainly, as a scholar, a very much higher reputation than Mr. Arnold himself” (Saturday Review 1861: 95). Yet Newman’s “aberrations” were the same ones that Arnold noticed, especially the archaism, which the reviewer described as “a consistent, though we think mistaken theory” (ibid.: 96). The Saturday Review’s distaste for Newman’s translation was in turn consistent with its other literary judgments: it tended to ridicule literary experiments that deviated from transparent discourse, like Robert Browning’s “obscure” poetry, and to attack literary forms that were populist as well as popular, like Dickens’s novels (Bevington 1941: 208–9, 155–67).

The liberal British Quarterly Review, a Nonconformist religious periodical edited by a Congregationalist minister, questioned Arnold’s desire “to imitate in England the French Academy” (British Quarterly Review 1865: 292; Houghton et al. 1987: iv, 114–25). This was considered “an intellectual foppery” since the fundamental individualism of English culture resisted any notion of a national academy: “Mr. Arnold seems determined to ignore the fact that an academic style is impossible among the English, who are by nature original” (British Quarterly Review 1865: 292). Yet the reviewer agreed “that Homeric translation demands a noble simplicity,” adding that unquestionably Mr. Arnold is right in placing Homer in a very different class from the ballad-poets with whom he has frequently been compared. The ballad, in its most perfect form, belongs to a rude state of society – to a time when ideas were few. This cannot be said of Homer. His very existence is sufficient proof of a social development quite equal to that of Shakespeare's time, though far simpler in its form.

(Ibid.: 293)

The reviewer assumed both Newman's historicist concept of the ballad and the Whig historiography on which it was based. But Newman's populist reading of Homer was rejected in favor of Arnoldian nobility. This move made a liberal periodical like the British Quarterly Review no different from the Tory Dublin University Magazine, in which a review of two hexameter translations inspired by Arnold's lectures singled out Newman's version for special criticism: "his unrhymed ballad metre, his quaint flat diction, and his laughter-moving epithets" amounted to an "unlucky burlesque" (Dublin University Magazine 1862: 644; Sullivan 1983b: 119–23). Newman's verse form was described as "the mongrel ballad measure of modern Greece," a particularly inappropriate choice for Homer's pure nobility.

Arnold's recommendation of hexameters for Homeric translation was answered by five scholarly translators within fifteen years of his lectures. But, ironically, none of them produced the effect of "swift-flowing movement" that he saw as a key feature of Homer's verse (Arnold 1960: 142). These prosodic experiments failed because they were not based on accepted or recognizable rules: either they were "much too dactylic," as Arnold had criticized Longfellow's Evangeline, or they combined quantitative with accentual meters so that individual lines tended to be difficult to read and scan as hexameters (ibid.: 151). As Yopie Prins has shown, "metrical translations of Homer failed to achieve the fluency to which they aspired, as their flow was disrupted by misplaced accents and displaced caesuras" (Prins 2005: 252).

Nonetheless, Arnold can be said to have won his debate with Newman, even if a loose form of hexameter took almost a century to gain widespread acceptance – in the "free six-beat line" of Richmond Lattimore's immensely popular version (Lattimore 1951: 55).¹⁴ The fate of Newman's project was marginalization in his own time and since, with critiques giving way to virtual oblivion. This can be seen, first, in the publishing histories of the controversial documents. Between 1861 and 1924 British and American publishers brought out seventeen single-volume editions of Arnold's lectures on translating Homer; between 1905 and 1954 fourteen different editions of Arnold's selected essays contained the lectures – not to mention their inclusion in several complete editions of Arnold's writing. Newman's Iliad was reprinted only once, in 1871, and thereafter known primarily through Arnold's quotations. Newman's reply too was printed only once in the nineteenth century. During the first half of the twentieth, it was reprinted frequently, but only in selections of Arnold's essays, presented as a supporting document subordinated to Arnold's more important lectures, a minor text included to provide cultural background for the major author (see e.g. Arnold 1914). In 1960, the editor of Arnold's Complete Prose Works, R. H. Super, believed that Newman's reply wasn't worth reprinting:

His essay has achieved undeserved immortality only by being printed in several modern editions of Arnold's essays (e.g. Oxford Standard Authors and Everyman's Library); readers who wish to see what provoked the best of Arnold's Homeric lectures may find it in one of those volumes.

Super saw Arnold's lectures as valuable in themselves, transcending the cultural moment that called them forth, independent of Newman's translation, of the entire international controversy, unquestionably superior to the other positions in the debate. Arnold's domesticating translation theory, as well as the academic cultural values that informed it, had by this point achieved canonical status in British and American literary cultures.

Arnold's ascendancy over Newman has taken other forms since the 1860s. Arnold's lectures coined a satiric neologism for Newman's translation discourse – to "Newmanize" – and for the next twenty-five years this word was part of the lexicon of critical terms in the literary periodicals. In 1886, for example, the Athenaeum ran a favorable review of Arthur Way's translation of the Iliad, but the reviewer nonetheless complained that "Mr. Way, in fact, is a little inclined to 'Newmanize'" because he "sometimes falls" into a "mongrel vocabulary," deviating from current English usage: "Pure English of the simple sort is amply sufficient for the translating of Homer" (Athenaeum 1886: 482–3).

A foreignizing practice similar to Newman's was adopted by another socially engaged Victorian translator, William Morris. In this case, it was Morris's socialist investment in medievalism that led him to cultivate an archaic lexicon drawn from various literary forms, elite and popular (cf. Chandler 1970: 209–30). Morris's experiments received much more appreciative reviews than Newman's, but they were also attacked, and for some of the same reasons. In 1888, the Quarterly Review ran an adulatory assessment of Arnold's writing that extended his critique of Homeric translations to Morris's Odyssey (1887–8): "By this travesty of an archaic diction, Mr. William Morris [...] has overlaid Homer with all the grotesqueness, the conceits, the irrationality of the Middle Ages, as Mr. Arnold justly says that Chapman overlaid him" (Quarterly Review 1888: 407–8).

In the same year, Longman's Magazine, a monthly devoted to bringing "literature of a high standard" to a mass audience, ran an article in which Morris's translations were cited as prime examples of "Wardour-Street Early English – a perfectly modern article with a sham appearance of the real antique about it" (Ballantyne 1888: 589; Sullivan 1984: 209–13). This reference to the shops in Wardour Street that sold antique furniture, both authentic and imitation, questioned the authenticity of Morris's archaism while linking it to nonstandard English dialects and marginal literary forms. The reviewer's elitism was recognizably Arnoldian:

Poems in which guests go bedward to beds that are arrayed right meet, poems in which thrall-folk seek to the feast-hall a-winter, do not belong to any literary centre. They are provincial; they are utterly without distinction; they are unspeakably absurd.

(Ballantyne 1888: 593)

The “literary centre” was fluent translation. In 1889 the Quarterly Review likewise attacked Morris’s Aeneid (1875) because of “the sense of incongruity inspired by such Wardour-Street English as eyen and clepe” (Faulkner 1973: 28, n. 81). Here the “centre” is also identified as current standard English, the language of contemporary political institutions, leading politicians. The Longman’s article on “Wardour-Street English” observed that if the Lord Chancellor or Mr. Speaker were to deliver one of these solemn pronouncements in any cockney or county dialect, he would leave upon his hearers the same sense of the grotesque and the undignified which a reader carries away from an author who, instead of using his own language in its richest and truest literary form, takes up a linguistic fad, and, in pursuit of it, makes his work provincial instead of literary.

Morris’s translations did no more than “pretend to be literature,” because literary texts were written in a dialect of English that was educated and official and thus excluded popular linguistic and literary forms.

In the academy, where Arnold the apologist for an academic elite was ensconced as a canonical writer, the historicizing translations of Newman and Morris have repeatedly been subjected to Arnoldian thrashings. T. S. Osmond’s 1912 study of the Arnold–Newman controversy agreed with Arnold’s “protests against the use of ridiculous or too uncommon words” in translations because they preempt the illusion of transparency: “One’s attention is held by the words, instead of by the thing that is being told” (Osmond 1912: 82). In 1956 Basil Willey’s attempt to rehabilitate Newman’s reputation focused mainly on his religious treatises, particularly The Soul (1849), which Willey felt should be admitted to the Victorian canon, assigned “a much higher rank in devotional literature” (Willey 1956: 45). Yet although Willey gave a generally balanced account of the translation controversy, he finally agreed with Arnold that Newman lacked the “individual personality” to render Homer’s “grand style”: “Newman, with all his great merits, was not a poet” because “his spirit” was not sufficiently “free, flexible and elastic” (ibid.; see also Annan 1944: 191).

In 1962, J. M. Cohen, the translator of canonical writers like Rabelais and Cervantes, published a history of English-language translation in which he approvingly described the dominant domesticating practice and the “complete reversal of taste” that made Victorian archaism “unreadable” (although, as we have seen, it was definitely unreadable to many Victorians as well): “In contrast to the Victorians and Edwardians [...] craftsmen in the last twenty years have aimed principally at interpretation in current language” (Cohen 1962: 65). Cohen himself followed this dominant tendency towards transparent discourse, asserting that “the theory of Victorian translation appears from our point of view to have been founded on a fundamental error” and faulting Morris in particular for the density of his archaism: “Even the meaning has become obscure” (ibid.: 24, 25). Cohen agreed with Arnold in attributing what he considered the defects of Victorian translation to its historicism. The experiments developed by translators like Newman, Morris, Robert Browning, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, and Edward Fitzgerald were misguided, Cohen felt, because the translators had “adapted their authors’ styles to their more or less erroneous pictures of the age in which these authors lived and worked” (ibid.: 29). Yet Cohen was himself making the anachronistic assumption that the correct historical “pictures” were in “current language,” respectful of the modern canon of “plain prose uniformity” in translation (ibid.: 33).

Finally, there is perhaps no clearer sign of Arnold’s continuing power in British and American literary cultures than Robert Fagles’s 1990 version of the Iliad, Winner of the Harold Morton Landon Award for poetry translation from the Academy of American Poets. Fagles’s preface begins by acknowledging the oral quality of Homeric verse, but then reverts to Arnold’s reading of Homer:

Homer’s work is a performance, even in part a musical event. Perhaps that is the source of his speed, directness and simplicity that Matthew Arnold heard – and his nobility too, elusive yet undeniable, that Arnold chased but never really caught.

(Fagles 1990: ix)

A classics translator who edited Pope’s Homer and was for many years professor of Comparative Literature at Princeton, Fagles demonstrates not just that Arnold’s reading still prevails today, but that it continues to be affiliated with the academy and with the dominant tradition of English-language translation, fluent domestication. Fagles aimed for a version that was “literate” in an academic (i.e. Arnoldian) sense, negotiating between the “literal” and the “literary” in a way that implemented Dryden’s notion of “paraphrase,” producing in the end a modernized Homer:

Not a line-for-line translation, my version of the Iliad is, I hope, neither so literal in rendering Homer’s language as to cramp and distort my own – though I want to convey as much of what he says as possible – nor so literary as to brake his energy, his forward drive – though I want my work to be literate, with any luck. For the more literal approach seems too little English, and the more literary seems too little Greek. I have tried to find a cross between the two, a modern English Homer.

(Ibid.: x)

Fagles also follows – even if in a flexible way – Arnold’s recommendation of hexameters for Homeric translation: “Working from a loose five- or six-beat line but inclining more to six, I expand at times to seven beats [...] or contract at times to three” (ibid.: xi).

3 Newman’s foreignizing and contemporary translation

The Victorian controversy offers several lessons that can be brought to bear on contemporary English-language translation. Perhaps most importantly, the controversy suggests that domesticating translation can be resisted without necessarily privileging a cultural elite. Newman advocated Schleiermacher’s foreignizing practice, but he detached it from the cultural and political interests of a German literary coterie, at once elitist and nationalist. Newman instead assumed a more democratic concept of an English national culture, acknowledging its diversity and refusing to allow a cultural minority like the academy to dominate the nation. Newman was a scholar who truly believed that an English translator could address diverse cultural constituencies, satisfying scholarly canons of translation equivalence while appealing to popular taste: “While I profess to write for the unlearned English reader, yet I must necessarily be judged by classical scholars on the question of fidelity and correctness” (Newman 1853: vi).

Yet the “foreign” in Newman’s foreignizing translations was defined precisely by his resistance to academic literary values, by his aim to encompass rather than exclude popular forms affiliated with various social groups. Foreignizing translation is based on the assumption that literacy is not universal, that communication is complicated by cultural differences between and within linguistic communities. But foreignizing is also an attempt to recognize and allow those differences to shape cultural discourses in the translating language. Arnold’s advocacy of domesticating translation also did not assume a homogeneous national culture – indeed, for him the diversity of English literature meant chaos. Arnold’s response to cultural differences was to repress them, hewing to the dominant tradition in English-language translation and empowering an academic elite to maintain it. Newman demonstrated, however, that foreignizing translation can be a form of resistance in a democratic cultural politics.

The Victorian controversy also offers a practical lesson for contemporary English-language translators. It suggests that close translation, what Arnold called Newman’s “literalness,” does not necessarily lead to unidiomatic, unintelligible English. Schleiermacher recommended this strategy, and Newman likewise argued that “in many passages it is of much value to render the original line by line” (Newman 1856: viii–ix), incurring Arnold’s satire for verbatim renderings of Homeric epithets – “ashen-speared,” “brazen-cloaked” (Arnold 1960: 165). But Newman’s close adherence to the lineation and word order of the Greek text was matched by an equally close attention to a distinctly English lexicon, syntax, and range of literary forms. Close translation certainly risks obscure diction, awkward constructions, and hybrid forms, but these vary in degree from one foreign text to another and from one receiving situation to another. Charges of “translationese” assume an investment in specific linguistic and cultural values to the exclusion of others. Hence close translation is foreignizing only because its approximation of the foreign text entails deviating from dominant receiving values – like the current standard dialect and transparent discourse.

What is “literal” about this approach is that it focuses on the letter of the translation as well as the foreign text, emphasizing the signifier, the signifying play that routinely gets fixed in English-language translation, reduced to a relatively coherent signified. Newman’s foreignizing translation released this play, adding a surplus of meanings to the foreign text by encompassing various English-language cultural discourses, past and present, elite and popular, poetic and novelistic, English and Scottish. In foreignizing translation, the ethnocentric violence that every act of translating wreaks on a foreign text is matched by a violent disruption of receiving cultural values that challenges forms of domination, whether nationalist or elitist. Foreignizing undermines the very concept of nation by invoking the diverse constituencies that any such concept tends to elide.

Since the 1990s foreignizing translation has emerged more decisively in British and American cultures, reaching wide audiences and qualifying, if not simply disproving, criticisms that such translation is necessarily elitist, exclusionary of popular readerships (see Robinson 1997: 105–6). In translating two volumes of Gothic fiction by the nineteenth-century Italian writer I. U. Tarchetti, Fantastic Tales (1992) and Passion: A Novel (1994), I chose a genre with both elite and popular traditions in English to allow Tarchetti’s cultural differences, especially his occasionally humorous tone and his socially oriented themes, to defamiliarize those traditions. To resist the discursive regime of fluency, I combined current standard English with an archaic lexicon and syntax typical of British and American Gothic from Edgar Allan Poe and Mary Shelley to Bram Stoker, producing a style that was at once readable and evocative, and that, although not satisfying to every reader, was favorably received by reviewers for both sophisticated literary periodicals and horror fanzines (Venuti 1998: 13–20). Through similar means Megan Backus’s translation of Banana Yoshimoto’s novel Kitchen (1993) contributed to a reformation of the canon of contemporary Japanese fiction in English: the Japanese text presented an Americanized Japan that ran counter to prevalent Orientalist stereotypes, and the English version combined current standard usage with colloquialisms and poetical archaisms while retaining a substantial number of Japanese cultural terms (ibid.: 74–5, 84–7). Despite this heterogeneity of theme and style, Backus’s work has been described as appealing successfully to a “middlebrow” audience – and, paradoxically, by a critic of foreignizing translation effects as I have presented them (Harker 1999). The reception of these translations makes quite clear not only that foreignizing can cross the cultural boundaries between elite and popular readerships, but that it can change reading patterns by broadening the spectrum of linguistic forms used in translating and thereby redefining commonly accepted notions of fluency. Readability in translation need not be tied to the current standard dialect of the translating language.

Perhaps the most persuasive evidence for these points can be found in the work of Richard Pevear and Larissa Volokhonsky who have pioneered the use of foreignizing translation with canonical Russian fiction. Their first effort, a version of Dostoevsky's The Brothers Karamazov (1990), was pitched against previous versions by translators like Constance Garnett who, as Pevear put it, "revised, 'corrected,' or smoothed over his idiosyncratic prose" (Pevear and Volokhonsky 1990: xi). To restore the stylistic peculiarities that Garnett had removed in the interest of fluency, Pevear and Volokhonsky adhered more closely to Dostoevsky's Russian, a discursive strategy that has been confirmed by various readers, native speakers of Russian as well as academic specialists and translators of Russian literature (Navrozov 1990; Knapp 1994; May 1994: 53–4; France 2000: 596–7). For Pevear and Volokhonsky, however, close adherence to the source text did not limit their development of a suitable English lexicon and syntax which significantly varies current standard usage.

Consider this passage from their version of The Brothers Karamazov:

Fyodor Pavlovich saw at once (and this must be remembered) that Mitya had a false and inflated idea of his property. Fyodor Pavlovich was quite pleased with this, as it suited his own designs. He simply concluded that the young man was frivolous, wild, passionate, impatient, a wastrel who, if he could snatch a little something for a time, would immediately calm down, though of course not for long. And this Fyodor Pavlovich began to exploit; that is, he fobbed him off with small sums, with short-term handouts, until, after four years, Mitya, having run out of patience, came to our town a second time to finish his affairs with his parent, when it suddenly turned out, to his great amazement, that he already had precisely nothing, that it was impossible even to get an accounting, that he had already received the whole value of his property in cash from Fyodor Pavlovich and might even be in debt to him, that in terms of such and such deals that he himself had freely entered into on such and such dates, he had no right to demand anything more, and so on and so forth. The young man was stunned, suspected a lie or a trick, was almost beside himself, and, as it were, lost all reason.

(Pevear and Volokhonsky 1990: 12)

Here Pevear and Volokhonsky recreated features of Dostoevsky's syntax that disrupt fluency, such as in the fourth sentence, where the opening inversion ("this Pavlovich began to exploit") and the subsequent series of relative clauses follow the Russian (correspondence with Peter France, 24 October 2006). The English also contains noticeably nonstandard lexical items that reflect repeated shifts between formal and conversational registers in Dostoevsky's prose, even if the translation is not completely in synch with those shifts. The passage acquires an elevated tone from several instances of archaism that work to signal the historical remoteness of the text, such as "suited his own designs," "fobbed him off with small sums," "wastrel," and "beside himself." But there is also a recurrent use of colloquialisms, some of which can be found in nineteenth-century writing (“handouts,” “cash,” “deals”) while others were previously standard forms that have since become more informal (“run out of,” “turned out”) (OED). It is this sort of heterogeneous language, the result partly of adhering to the Russian text and partly of experimenting with different registers and dialects of English, that releases the foreignizing effects of Pevear and Volokhonsky’s translation against the fluent strategy of a translator like Garnett who restricted herself mainly to the current standard dialect. Choices like “fobbed him off” and “wastrel,” “handouts” and “cash,” do not appear in her version, nor does the syntactical inversion. She clearly aimed to facilitate the reader’s movement through the passage, going so far as to divide into two the long sentence containing the inversion and to omit entirely the last clause (“and, as it were, lost all reason”).

Nonetheless, Pevear and Volokhonsky’s translation has displaced Garnett’s as the authoritative English version of Dostoevsky’s text, establishing a new kind of readability that makes the novel accessible to both elite and popular readers. Sales bear out this development to some extent: The Brothers Karamazov sells 14,000 copies per year in Pevear and Volokhonsky’s translation, a figure that is no doubt maintained by its adoption as a textbook in academic institutions, but that also indicates its broad appeal to diverse audiences (Remnick 2005: 108). This appeal can be inferred from an internet discussion group on “Classics Corner,” a section of the “Constant Reader” webpage devoted to canonical texts (<http://www.constantreader.com>). In 2001 a group of readers based their discussion of Dostoevsky’s novel on Pevear and Volokhonsky’s translation, a passage from which was compared to Garnett’s version in one exchange and judged to be more acceptable: in the words of a participant, it “is fuller and flows better.” This view indicates not only that Pevear and Volokhonsky’s version avoids deleting portions of the Russian text, but that a popular reader may regard it as more fluent than Garnett’s, perhaps because – despite its foreignizing effects – it is closer to current usage than her Edwardian English.

Yet the idea that a foreignizing translation can be called fluent must give us pause. More is at stake in this judgment than merely a broadening of the conditions of readability in a translation. It suggests that readers seeking the popular pleasure of vicarious participation can find it even in a translated novel cast in such heterogeneous language as Pevear and Volokhonsky’s. To be sure, some foreignizing translations may be so extreme in their mixture of registers, dialects, and styles as to preempt a popular response; Louis and Celia Zukofsky’s modernist version of Catullus’s poetry would be one such case (see below, pp. 186–94). But readers who favor sympathetic identification with the characters in a novel can adopt that response with less extreme forms of foreignization. The translation still allows them to read for meaning instead of language, narrative instead of style, characterization instead of discourse, whereby their own reading practices contribute to producing the effect of transparency that supports the realist illusion.

An elite response, resting on the specialized knowledge of linguistic history, literary form, and cultural tradition that enables a detached appreciation of a text, is more likely to focus precisely on language, style, and discourse and therefore to lead to a reading of a translation as a translation, as a literary work in its own right, without collapsing it into the foreign text beneath the illusion of transparency (cf. Venuti 2004). Do elite readers, whether scholars or reviewers, writers or translators, in fact process translations in this way? Rarely, if at all. Some have even expressed a preference for greater fluency as exemplified in a previous version or grounded in current standard usage, particularly when confronted with a foreignizing translation like Pevear and Volokhonsky's (see Emerson 1991: 315–16; May 1994: 54). Thus if it is false that foreignizing translation is necessarily elitist, it is also false that elite readers necessarily value this kind of translating. To perceive foreignizing effects in a translation, a reader needs to look for them and to be capable of articulating them as such. Today, however, both elite and popular readers must learn how to read a translation, not as a simple communication of a foreign text, but as an interpretation that imitates yet varies foreign textual features in accordance with the translator's cultural situation and historical moment. Without such a reading practice, translation will remain invisible – regardless of the translator's discursive strategies or of the reader's knowledge and interests.

Chapter 4

Dissidence

The fundamental error of the translator is that he stabilizes the state in which his own language happens to find itself instead of allowing his language to be powerfully jolted by the foreign language.

Rudolf Pannwitz (tr. Richard Sieburth)

The search for alternatives to the domesticating tradition in English-language translation can locate different kinds of foreignizing practices, both in the choice of foreign texts and in the invention of translation discourses. A translator can signal the foreignness of the foreign text, not only by using a discursive strategy that deviates from prevailing discourses (e.g. dense archaism as opposed to transparency dependent on current standard usage), but also by choosing to translate a text that challenges the contemporary canon of foreign literature in the translating language. Foreignizing translation is a dissident cultural practice, maintaining a refusal of the dominant by developing affiliations with marginal linguistic and cultural values in the receiving situation, including foreign cultures that have been excluded because their differences effectively constitute a resistance to dominant values.¹ On the one hand, foreignizing translation enacts an ethnocentric appropriation of the foreign text merely by using a discourse in the translating language to render that text, but also by enlisting it in a political agenda in the translating culture, like dissidence. On the other hand, it is precisely this dissident stance that enables foreignizing translation to signal the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text and perform a work of cultural restoration, admitting the ethnodeviant and potentially revising literary canons in the translating language.

The translation projects of the Italian writer Iginio Ugo Tarchetti (1839–69) offer a provocative way to explore these issues. Tarchetti belonged to the Milanese movement known as the scapigliatura, a loosely associated group of artists, composers, and writers who contested bourgeois values in their bohemianism (scapigliato means “dishevelled”) and in their formal innovations. The literary members of this dissident group were at variance with the highly conservative realism that had dominated Italian fiction since Alessandro Manzoni’s I promessi sposi (The Betrothed, 1827, rev. 1840). And some of them abandoned Manzoni's sentimental Christian providentialism for a democratically oriented representation of class divisions, realistic but also romantic, historically detailed yet melodramatic, often with a topical engagement in events surrounding the Italian Unification, like the Austrian presence or the Italian conscript army (Carsaniga 1974).

Tarchetti's first novel, Paolina (1865), followed a seamstress who is persecuted by an aristocrat and ultimately raped and murdered. His second novel, Una nobile follia (A Noble Madness, 1866–7), a protest against the new standing army, focused on a military officer moved to desertion by distracted, pacifistic musings. The book caused an uproar in the press, and copies were openly burned at many barracks. Tarchetti's later narratives took more experimental forms. Fosca (1869), a semi-autobiographical novel about a pathological love affair, mixed several fictional discourses – romantic, fantastic, realistic, naturalistic – to counter the notion of character as a unified subjectivity (Caesar 1987). In a number of short narratives, some of which were posthumously published in 1869 as Racconti fantastici (Fantastic Tales), Tarchetti deployed the conventions and motifs of nineteenth-century fantasy to issue a fundamental challenge to realist representation and its ideological grounding in bourgeois individualism.

The appropriation of foreign texts was a crucial component of Tarchetti's dissident cultural politics. He was the first practitioner of the Gothic tale in Italy, and most of his fantastic narratives are based on specific texts by writers like E. T. A. Hoffmann, Edgar Allan Poe, Gérard Nerval, Théophile Gautier, and the collaboration of Émile Erckmann and Louis-Alexandre Chatrion (Mariani 1967; Rossi 1959). Tarchetti adapted fantastic motifs, reproduced scenes, translated, even plagiarized – yet each discursive practice served the political function of interrogating ideologies and addressing hierarchical social relations in Italy. His fantastic narratives mobilized foreign texts to question the hegemony of realist discourse in Italian fiction, and yet this mobilization, insofar as it entailed transforming foreign texts to function in a different cultural formation, simultaneously critiqued them from a different ideological standpoint. Tarchetti's Gothic tales were foreignizing in their appropriation of foreign texts that deviated from Italian cultural values, initiating a reformation of the Italian literary canon to admit fictional discourses other than realism, whether domestic or foreign. For the English-language translator who would cultivate foreignizing effects under the current regime of fluency, Tarchetti's practices show how translation can revise receiving cultural values by casting strategically chosen foreign texts in the dominant language, the standard dialect.

I Importing the fantastic

Tarchetti's first foreignizing move was his decision to appropriate the fantastic, a foreign discourse opposed to the bourgeois realism that prevailed in Italian fiction. The fantastic proves to be subversive of bourgeois ideology because it negates the formal conventions of realism and the individualistic concept of subjectivity on which they rest. The realist representation of chronological time, three-dimensional space, and personal identity is based on an empiricist epistemology that privileges a single, perceiving subject: the key assumption is that human consciousness is the origin of meaning, knowledge, and action, transcending discursive and ideological determinations (Watt 1957). The unity of time and space in realism points to a unified consciousness, usually a narrator or character taken to be authorial, and this subject-position establishes intelligibility in the narrative, making a specific meaning seem real or true, repressing the fact that it is an illusory effect of discourse, and thus suturing the reading consciousness into an ideological position, an interested ensemble of values, beliefs, and social representations. The truth-effect of realism, the illusion of transparency whereby language disappears and the world or the author seems present, shows that the form itself reproduces the transcendental concept of subjectivity in bourgeois individualism. As Catherine Belsey indicates,

Through the presentation of an intelligible history which effaces its own status as discourse, classic realism proposes a model in which author and reader are subjects who are the source of shared meanings, the origin of which is mysteriously extradiscursive. [...] This model of intersubjective understanding, of shared understanding of a text which represents the world, is the guarantee not only of the truth of the text but of the reader's existence as an autonomous and knowing subject in a world of knowing subjects. In this way, classic realism constitutes an ideological practice in addressing itself to readers as subjects, interpellating them in order that they freely accept their subjectivity and their subjection.

The fantastic undermines the transcendental subject in realist discourse by creating an uncertainty about the metaphysical status of the narrative. Often this uncertainty is provoked by using the formal conventions of realism to represent a fantastic disorder of time, space, and character and thereby to suspend the reader between two discursive registers, the mimetic and the marvelous. Confronted with the fantastic, the reader experiences what Tzvetan Todorov calls a "hesitation" between natural and supernatural explanations. "The fantastic," he remarks, "lasts only as long as a certain hesitation: a hesitation common to reader and character, who must decide whether or not what they perceive derives from 'reality' as it exists in the common opinion" (Todorov 1975: 41; cf. Jackson 1981: 26–37). The unified consciousness of realism is thus split between opposing alternatives, intelligibility gives way to doubt, and the reader is released from the ideological positioning in the text, invited to perceive that "the common opinion" of reality encodes moral values and serves political interests, that subjectivity is not transcendental but determinate, a site of confused meanings, ideological contradictions, social conflicts. The fantastic explodes the formal conventions of realism in order to reveal their individualistic assumptions; but by introducing an epistemological confusion, a fantastic narrative can also interrogate the ideological positions it puts to work, expose their concealment of various relations of domination, and encourage thinking about social change. In the fantastic, Hélène Cixous observes, “the subject flounders in the exploded multiplicity of its states, shattering the homogeneity of the ego of unawareness, spreading out in every possible direction, into every possible contradiction, transegoistically”; and it is this discursive strategy that distinguishes nineteenth-century writers like Hoffmann as opponents of “logocentrism, idealism, theologism, all the props of society, the scaffolding of political and subjective economy, the pillars of society” (Cixous 1974: 389).

Tarchetti’s thinking on the relations between fictional discourse and ideology can be glimpsed in an essay from the very start of his career, “Idee minime sul romanzo” (“Minimum Ideas on the Novel”), published in the periodical Rivista minima on 31 October 1865. This early statement shows him slipping uneasily between various positions, advocating different kinds of fictional discourse, assuming different concepts of subjectivity, imagining different forms of social organization. He initially asserts a realist view of the novel, likening it to history:

From the first confidences, from the first revelations men make to men, from the first emotion, the first pain, the first hope, is born the novel, which is the history of the human heart and the family, just as history is properly called the novel of society and public life.

(Tarchetti 1967: II, 523)

But then Tarchetti proceeds to argue for the priority of fictional over historical representation by putting the truth-effect of realism into question, characterizing the novel as an imaginary resolution to social contradictions, a genre that fictively compensates for the “terrible odyssey of crimes” in history and makes possible a renewal of social life:

I held a novel in my hands, and in a little while I was tempted to reconcile myself [to men]; I shall not say how different they appeared to me from those I encountered in histories, I shall not note the marvelous world that opened to me at a glance: in the novel I knew man free, in history I knew man subjected to man.

(Ibid.)

Discourse produces concrete social effects; the novel can alter subjectivity and motor social change, even for a literary bohemian like Tarchetti, whose scapigliato refusal to conform to the canons of bourgeois respectability situated him in the margins of Italian society. For the novel to have this social function, however, it would seem that realism must be rejected: a realist discourse like history can represent social life only as an “odyssey,” a wandering, an atomization in which agents victimize one another; the novel can contribute to a social homecoming, the reconstruction of a collective, only by representing a “marvelous world” wherein hierarchical social relations are resolved.

Tarchetti’s distinction between the freedom of the novel and the subjection of history at first appears a romantic retreat from society to culture, a transcendental aesthetic realm where the subject can regain its self-possession, its autonomy, although at the expense of a withdrawal from political engagement.² Tarchetti does in fact revert to romantic expressive theory at various points in the essay, validating an individualistic program of authorial self-expression, transparent discourse, illusionistic response: he favors writers whose inner life [...] remains in such perfect harmony with their works, that the reader is not tempted to say to himself: my emotion is inappropriate, that man wrote to argue a position; we toss away any book that issues only from ingenuity.

At other points, however, Tarchetti views the novel not as a window onto the author, “the transparent waves of those lakes which in their calmness allow a glimpse of the bed containing them” (ibid.), but rather as a historically specific “form of literature” (ibid.: 522), a literary genre with a social significance that exceeds authorial psychology:

Italy, composed of many small states, with entirely different laws, customs, dialects, social practices, and I dare say, soils, should create great and extremely varied novels.

(Ibid.: 526)

And when Tarchetti describes the value of a long tradition in the novel, he assumes that fictional discourse can never be free of social determinations:

If the novel were as ancient as history, and at all times and in all nations had the popularity which it now enjoys in Europe, how many shadows would have been cleared away, how much light would have been cast on many neglected points, on the arts, the customs, the laws and habits and domestic life of many countries whose history refers only to political relations with other countries. What happiness there would be, what exuberance of moral life in reliving such a remote past, what lessons for the present age, what development of our imaginative faculties, and I dare say how many illusions in the power of our faith and our memories, and what greater resignation to our fate! If it is true that humanity progresses slowly, but steadily, and that nothing can stop or drive genius backward in its path, our posterity, in thousands of years, will live our current moral life: for them letters will have reached that sublime and general goal, which is to multiply and increase and invigorate in the spirit the thousands of infinite sensations by which the gigantic sentiment of life is manifested.

(Ibid.: 523–4)

The beginning of this remarkably discontinuous passage has Tarchetti optimistically treating fictional discourse as a liberating source of knowledge and utopian imagining, assuming a liberal humanism in which the novel restores to subjectivity its freedom and unity (“development of our imaginative faculties”). Yet Tarchetti’s sudden reference to “illusions” skeptically revises this view: the novel now becomes a source of collective mystifications (“illusions in the power of our faith and our memories”) and imaginary compensations for frustrated desire (“greater resignation to our fate”), whereby the passage shifts to the assumption that subjectivity is always situated in transindividual conditions of which it can never be fully conscious or free. In the end, the “progresses” of “humanity” seem measured not by a liberal model of social life which guarantees personal identity and autonomy, but a democratic collective characterized by subjective difference and cultural heterogeneity (“the gigantic sentiment of life”). Hence the “letters” which represent and sustain this democracy aim “to multiply and increase and invigorate in the spirit [...] thousands of infinite sensations.” The kind of fictional discourse suggested by this aim seems less a panoramic representation of social groups which adheres to the unities of realism than a social delirium which proliferates psychological states and confounds temporal and spatial coordinates, representing that “marvelous world” where the reader is freed from social isolation.

In evaluating the current situation of the Italian novel, Tarchetti’s constant theme is the moral and political failure of realism. He laments Italy’s lack of a strong tradition in the novel in contrast to other countries. Amid much praise for English, American, German and French writers, Manzoni is degraded as second-rate:

There is no room to doubt that I promessi sposi has so far been the best Italian novel, but it is unnecessary to demonstrate that it is a mediocre novel compared to the masterpieces of other nations.

(Tarchetti 1967: II, 528)

Tarchetti repeats a list of defects in Manzoni’s novel and attributes them to its realist discourse:

As for the charge moved by someone, that the book contains little heart, that the eternal episode of the nun (although very beautiful) damages the novel more than anything else, and arouses in the reader such interest as is not satisfied, that Don Abbondio becomes more disparaged for his cowardice than loved for the agreeableness of his character, that Renzo and Lucia are two terribly apathetic and cold lovers, it is worth observing in part that Manzoni wanted to paint men as they are, not as they should be, and in that he was a profound and accurate writer.

(Ibid.: 528–9)

Tarchetti's laconic defense comes off weakly against his detailed statement of the charge, and realism appears very unattractive indeed: it is incapable of representing extreme emotional states and contains ideological contradictions in its representation of the priest Don Abbondio which are symptomatic of its Christian conservatism and bourgeois sentimentality.

Tarchetti recognizes that the canonization of I promessi sposi and the numerous translations of contemporary French novels made realism the dominant fictional discourse in Italy, but he concludes that Italian culture is suffering from a "decadence" partly maintained by the translation patterns of Italian publishers (Tarchetti 1967: II, 535). He argues that the French novels which are translated and issued by our publishers, are generally such books as enjoy no or little reputation in France [and] with very few exceptions, their investment is always aimed at the circulation of obscene novels.

(Ibid.: 532)

Tarchetti singles out French novelists like the prolific Charles-Paul de Kock (1794–1871), whose sentimental, titillating realism enjoyed enormous popularity in Italy. Italian translations of over sixty novels by de Kock were published between 1840 and 1865, bearing titles like La moglie, il marito e l'amante (The Wife, the Husband and the Lover, 1853) and Il cornuto (The Cuckold, 1854); some of these novels appeared in different translations a few years apart from various publishers, showing that the Italian publishing industry was scrambling to exploit de Kock's marketability (Costa and Vignini 1991). Tarchetti was most concerned about the social and political implications of these cultural developments, which he finally brands retrograde:

It must not be forgotten that Italy, unique in the world, possesses a guide to brothels, that our licentious novels are reproduced and popular in France as well, that the men who write them enjoy every civil right and public admiration, and belong for the most part to the periodical press [whereas] the circulation of every political text opposed to the principles of the government, but consistent with those of humanity and progress, is immediately obstructed.

Tarchetti's experiments with the fantastic can be seen as an intervention into this cultural situation: they were developed to resolve the crisis he diagnosed in Italian fictional discourse, the inadequacy of realism to serve a democratic cultural politics. The fantastic answered Tarchetti's call for a fiction to represent that "marvelous world" of "sensations" which he saw as a remedy for hierarchical social relations and his own social isolation; the freeing of subjectivity in fantastic discourse was a freedom from subjection. Because, in Tarchetti's view, realism dominated Italian fiction to no politically progressive end, his intervention took the form of writing in a foreign genre opposed to realism, the Gothic tale. Tarchetti's effort to write against the Manzonian grain in fact projected a revision of the history of fiction, in which the novel didn't originate in Europe, but in "the Orient, from which civilization spread through all the world" (Tarchetti 1967: II, 524). The prototype of the novel became, not epic or any form of realist discourse, but fantasy, and not the Bible or the Iliad, but The Arabian Nights:

The Persians and the Arabs drew from the variety of their nomad life, and from their virgin nature, and from their burning sky the first novelistic narratives, hence the laws and customs of the Arabs' social and domestic community have been well-known and familiar to us for a long time, and Strabo lamented that love for the marvelous rendered uncertain the histories of these nations.

(Ibid.)

Tarchetti's Orientalist literary history clarifies the political agenda in his use of the fantastic, but simultaneously discloses an ideological contradiction which runs counter to that agenda. The passage shows him actively rewriting his cultural materials so as to transform the Orient into a vehicle for his democratic social vision. Whereas the Arabian tales actually offer glimpses of despotic monarchies, and the geographer Strabo describes the nomadic Arabs as "a tribe of brigands and shepherds" who are less "civilised" than the Syrians because their "government" is not as well "organised" (Strabo 1930: VII, 233, 255), Tarchetti drew on Rousseau's notion of natural human innocence and perceived only a utopian "community," close to "virgin nature" and not corrupted by the hierarchical social organization of Europe. Tarchetti also represented the Orient as exotic and phantasmagorical ("their burning sky," "love for the marvelous"), setting his concept of fiction apart from the realist discourse that dominated Italy by identifying with its other, the fantastic. Both these representations of the Orient, however, are clearly Eurocentric: they aim to make Persia and Arabia perform a European function, the regeneration of Italian fiction and society, and they never escape the racist opposition between Western rationality and Eastern irrationality. Tarchetti's literary history assumed the range of meanings which, as Edward Said has observed, were typical of romantic representations of the Orient: "sensuality, promise, terror, sublimity, idyllic pleasure, intense energy" (Said 1978: 118).

This racial ideology, obviously in conflict with Tarchetti's democratic politics, becomes more explicitly damaging to his project in his closing reference to Strabo, which abruptly reverses the logic of his argument. Tarchetti initially treated Arabian narratives as a mirror of the Arabian social order, a reliable representation of its "laws and customs," but he concluded in apparent agreement with Strabo's complaint that these texts reflect little more than an overheated imagination. Tarchetti's typically romantic Orientalism seems to result in an uncritical acceptance of Strabo's equation of the East with "love for the marvelous." Yet Strabo's point that the "histories" of Eastern countries lack a firm basis in reality renders "uncertain," not only Arabian narratives, but the democratic images that Tarchetti found in them, questioning his earlier treatment of the novel as figuring a "marvelous world" without social hierarchies. Tarchetti's citation of Strabo suggests that the utopian world of the novel may be no more than a misrepresentation of its social situation, especially in the case of the Eastern prototypes of the genre. It is worth noting that Tarchetti in effect reiterated this view at the end of his brief tale, "La fortuna di capitano Gubart" ("Captain Gubart's Fortune"), published the same year as his essay on the novel. After demonstrating the arbitrariness of class distinctions by relating how a poor street musician is mistakenly awarded a royal military commission, the narrator concluded: "This incident, despite its decided resemblance to those famous ones of the Arabian tales, is indisputably true and well-known" (Tarchetti 1967: I, 79). This reference to The Arabian Nights seems designed to satirize Italian social relations as fantastic and therefore irrational, but it can make this satiric point only by assuming the irrationality of Eastern culture and by distinguishing Tarchetti's narrative as "true." Tarchetti sought to enlist foreign fantastic texts in the democratic cultural politics he conducted in Italy, but his Orientalism was implicated in the key binary opposition by which Europe subordinated, and justified its colonization of, the same foreign countries whose texts he considered politically useful.

Given the diverse linguistic, cultural, and ideological materials that constituted Tarchetti's project, it can be seen as what Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari call a minor utilization of a major language:

Even when it is unique a language remains a mixture, a schizophrenic mélange, a Harlequin costume in which very different functions of language and distinct centers of power are played out, blurring what can be said and what can't be said; one function will be played off against the other, all the degrees of territoriality and relative deterritorialization will be played out. Even when major, a language is open to an intensive utilization that makes it take flight along creative lines of escape which, no matter how slowly, no matter how cautiously, can now form an absolute deterritorialization.

(Deleuze and Guattari 1986: 26)

The major language that Tarchetti confronted was the Tuscan dialect of Italian, the linguistic standard for Italian literature since the Renaissance. In 1840, after more than a decade of research into the question of a national language, Manzoni published an extensive revision of the first version of I promessi sposi which recast it in the Tuscan dialect, undertaking the nationalistic project of unifying Italy through its language and literature, at once situating his text in the Italian literary canon and establishing a linguistic model for fiction which could be understood by most Italian readers (Reynolds 1950). Because Tarchetti's fantastic narratives were written in the Tuscan dialect, they took the major language on a line of escape that deterritorialized the dominant fictional discourse. He used the Italian literary standard to produce Gothic tales, a genre that was not merely marginal in relation to realism, but that existed in Italian culture primarily as sporadic translations of a few foreign writers, namely Hoffmann, Poe, and Adelbert von Chamisso.³ Traced with German, English, French, even Arabic texts, Tarchetti's tales foregrounded what realism repressed, the discursive and ideological determinations of subjectivity. In his foreign-derived, fantastic narratives, the standard dialect was turned into a political arena where the bourgeois individualism of realist discourse was contested in order to interrogate various class, gender, and racial ideologies. Nevertheless, Tarchetti's Orientalism shows that he did not have his cultural politics entirely under control: his interrogations were democratically directed, but they sometimes repressed the ideological contradictions precipitated by their own materials and methods of appropriating them.

2 Plagiarizing Mary Shelley

Methods of cultural appropriation like translation would clearly be useful to Tarchetti's project of putting the major language to minor uses. And the deterritorializing effect of this project would clearly make his translations foreignizing in their impact on dominant cultural values in Italian. His most intensive utilization of the standard dialect did in fact occur in his translation of a foreign fantastic narrative, an English Gothic tale written by Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley. The political significance of Tarchetti's translation, however, is complicated by the fact that it is a plagiarism of the English text.

In 1865 Tarchetti published a tale entitled "Il mortale immortale (dall'inglese)" ("The Immortal Mortal (From the English)") in the Rivista minima in two installments, on 21 June and 31 August. The first installment was unsigned; the second bore his name. These appearances indicate Tarchetti's authorship, and so Italian readers have always assumed, none venturing beyond the supposition that he adapted the fantastic motif of his tale, the elixir of immortality, from two French texts. What Tarchetti actually published, however, is his Italian translation of Shelley's tale "The Mortal Immortal," which was first published in the English literary annual The Keepsake in 1833. In 1868 Tarchetti had another opportunity to acknowledge his translation, but he did not: while serving as the editor of the periodical Emporio pittoresco, he reprinted it under his name with a different title, "L'elixir dell'immortalità (imitazione dall'inglese)" ("The Elixir of Immortality (An Imitation from the English)").

Tarchetti's use of parenthetical subtitles ("From the English," "An Imitation from the English") appears to glance at the actual nature of his text, but this is misleading: they offer only the vaguest indication of the relationship between his Italian version and Shelley's tale. Tarchetti did introduce some significant changes: he altered a date, used different names for two main characters, omitted a few phrases and sentences, and added some of his own, all of which amount to a strong transformation of the English text. Nevertheless, in sentence after sentence, paragraph after paragraph, his Italian version is governed by the aim of reproduction: it adheres so closely to the syntactical and lexical features of Shelley's English as to be less an "imitation" than an interlingual translation. By failing to acknowledge his text as a translation, Tarchetti asserted his authorship of Shelley's material and therefore committed plagiarism. And it seems certain that he was fully aware of this fact. In 1865 he began a brief but intense period of activity in the burgeoning Milanese publishing industry, first printing his short fiction and serializing his novels in the periodical press and then issuing them in book form with several large publishers. He was also employed to write book-length translations. In 1869 he published his Italian versions of two English novels, one of which was Dickens's Our Mutual Friend (1865). In both cases, he was credited as the translator.

Tarchetti's financial difficulties no doubt figured in his motives to plagiarize Shelley's tale. The frenzied pace of his writing during the last four years of his life demonstrates that he was producing for immediate publication and payment. A memoir by his friend and collaborator Salvatore Farina shows Tarchetti drifting from one address to another, writing for several periodicals and publishers at once, but constantly poor, shabbily dressed, ill – he died of typhus and tuberculosis. In a letter dated 31 January 1867 Tarchetti complained to Farina about my usual economic complications [...] that I have nothing in the world, that from one day to the next I must find some way to dine, to dress, to house myself.

(Farina 1913: 37, 38)

The letter referred to Tarchetti's antimilitaristic novel Una nobile follia, which was currently being serialized in the periodical Il sole (November 1866 to March 1867): "every day I expect to finish these dramas [from the military life] which should yield me a little money" (ibid.: 39).

Farina's memoir suggests a financial motive for Tarchetti's plagiarism by relating an incident in which his knowledge of English becomes the pretext of a fraudulent scheme. Living for some weeks in a hotel in Parma, but unable to pay the bill, Tarchetti "posed as a professor of English" and announced in the newspapers and on every street corner of Parma that since he was travelling through the city, he would give a complete, forty-lesson course in the English language with his rapid method.

(Farina 1913: 34, 35)

Farina's rather melodramatic memoir seems to be unduly minimizing Tarchetti's proficiency in English by limiting it to "very little, just enough to attain a rudimentary understanding of Shakespeare and Byron and to translate Dickens by ear" (ibid.: 34). Tarchetti's translation of Shelley's tale confirms, on the contrary, that he had an excellent reading knowledge of English. All the same, this does not necessarily disprove Farina's assertion that "he did not speak English at all and would have been embarrassed to sustain a conversation" (ibid.). Farina notes that the registration for the course netted "a magnificent haul" (ibid.: 35), but Tarchetti gave much fewer than forty lessons:

when the professor no longer knew what to teach his pupils, together they read Shakespeare and Byron and smoked the cigarettes Iginio put out on the desk when the lesson began.

(Ibid.: 36)

This teaching scam was probably more profitable than Tarchetti's plagiarism. Yet since translation was poorly remunerated in nineteenth-century Italy, with payment usually taking the form of books as well as money, his implicit claim that his text was his creation would have earned him a higher fee than if he had published it as a translation (Berengo 1980: 340–6). A financial motive may also explain the curious retitling and reprinting of the text when he took over the editorship of the Emporio pittoresco. The different title and his signature claimed that it was his original tale being published for the first time.

Because the legal status of translation was just beginning to be defined in 1865, Tarchetti's plagiarism did not in fact constitute a copyright infringement which resulted in a financial loss for Shelley's estate and her English publisher. By the early nineteenth century, many countries had developed copyright statutes which gave the author exclusive control over the reproduction of her text for life and beyond. But international copyright conventions were slow to emerge, and translation rights were not always reserved for the author. In 1853, for example, a federal court in the United States held that a German translation of Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) which had not been licensed by Harriet Beecher Stowe did not infringe her copyright for the English-language text (Kaplan 1967: 29). Although England instituted the first important copyright statute at the beginning of the eighteenth century, in 1851, the year of Shelley's death, English law did not give the author translation rights. It was not until 1852 that the right of authors to license translations of their published texts was recognized by statute, which limited it to five years from the date of publication (Sterling and Carpenter 1986: 103). A general copyright law was not formulated in Italy until the Unification: on 25 June 1865, four days after Tarchetti published the first installment of his translation as his tale, the Italian government gave authors the right to "publish, reproduce, and translate" their texts, although the translation rights were limited to ten years from the date of publication (Piola-Caselli 1927: 22, 24, 26).

Tarchetti's plagiarism was not so much copyright infringement as a violation of the individualistic notion of authorship on which copyright is based. As Martha Woodmansee shows, copyright laws recognize the writer's ownership of a text insofar as he is its author or originator – "that is, insofar as his work is new and original, an intellectual creation which owes its individuality solely and exclusively to him" (Woodmansee 1984: 446). This notion of authorship assumes romantic expressive theory: the text is seen as expressing the unique thoughts and feelings of the writer, a free, unified consciousness which is not divided by determinations that exceed and possibly conflict with his intention. The author is assigned the sole and exclusive copyright because his subjectivity is taken to be a metaphysical essence which is present in his text and all its copies, but which transcends any difference or change introduced by formal determinations, like printing and binding, language and genre, and by economic and political conditions, like the publishing industry and government censorship. The very idea of authorial copyright, however, confesses the possibility of change because it is designed to control the form and marketing of the book by licensing reproduction and repressing change that is not authorized. Copyright opens up a contradiction in the individualistic notion of authorship by demonstrating that such law is suspended between metaphysics and materialism, acknowledging the material contingencies of form, the possibility of its difference from the author, but enacting its transparency with the metaphysical assumption of authorial presence.

Tarchetti's plagiarism violated this notion of authorship not by merely copying Shelley's tale, but by translating it. Because his plagiarism was a translation, it introduced a decisive change in the form of the original, specifically in its language; his assertion of authorship simultaneously masked this change and indicated that it was decisive enough to mark the creation of a new text which originated with him. Tarchetti's plagiarism covertly collapsed the distinction that an individualistic notion of authorship draws between author and translator, creator and imitator. Yet because his plagiarism remained undiscovered and unrationalized – at least until today – it continued to support this distinction; it did not reflect or contribute to any revision of nineteenth-century Italian opinion concerning the aesthetic and legal status of translation. All the same, the fact that Tarchetti's plagiarism was covert did not in any way mitigate its violation of authorship – nor its effect as an eminently foreignizing translation practice. Because his Italian translation was a plagiarism, it was especially subversive of bourgeois values in the major language. On the one hand, Tarchetti's text flouted bourgeois propriety and property by fraudulently exploiting the process of literary commodification in the Italian publishing industry; in this way, his plagiarism exemplified the nonconformist tendency of the scapigliatura to identify with socially subordinate groups, particularly the worker, the poor, and the criminal, professing a dissident refusal of the dominant by affiliating with the subcultural (Mariani 1967). On the other hand, Tarchetti's text deterritorialized the bourgeois fictional discourse that dominated Italian culture precisely because it was a plagiarism in the standard dialect, because it passed itself off not just as an original Gothic tale, but as one written originally in the Italian of Manzonian realism and therefore foreignizing in its impact on the Italian literary scene.

Yet Shelley's authorship comes back to worry the ideological standpoint of Tarchetti's intervention by raising the issue of gender. To be effective as a subversion of bourgeois values that deterritorialized the Italian literary standard, his text was required to maintain the fiction of his authorship, referring to Shelley's tale only in the vaguest way (“imitation”). At the same time, however, this fiction suppressed an instance of female authorship, so that the theft of Shelley’s literary creation had the patriarchal effect of female disempowerment, of limiting a woman’s social agency. This would seem to be a consequence which Tarchetti did not anticipate: some of his other fiction explicitly addressed male domination of women and the social construction of gender, whether in the graphic depiction of Paolina’s oppression or in the gender dislocations of his fantastic experiments (Caesar 1987). Most importantly, the tale he chose to plagiarize interrogates patriarchal images of male power and female weakness. Grounded in an antifeminist suppression of Shelley’s authorship, Tarchetti’s plagiarism nonetheless circulated her feminist fictional project in Italian culture. This ideological contradiction is further complicated by the fact that Tarchetti’s text is a translation. In order for Shelley’s tale to perform its political function in a different culture, it underwent a radical transformation that was simultaneously faithful and abusive, that both reproduced and supplemented the English text. The clearest indication of this uneven relationship appears in the subtle differences introduced by the Italian version: they questioned the class and racial ideologies which informed Shelley’s tale.

3 Translating the feminist fantastic

Shelley’s “The Mortal Immortal” is a first-person narrative in which an assistant to the sixteenth-century alchemist Cornelius Agrippa laments drinking the elixir of immortality. The opening sentence provokes the distinctive hesitation of the fantastic by citing a date that glanced at the English reader’s reality before suddenly establishing an unreal chronology: “July 16, 1833. – This is a memorable anniversary for me; on it I complete my three hundred and twenty-third year!” (Shelley 1976: 219). The text aims to suspend the reader between the two registers of fantastic discourse, the mimetic and the marvelous, by representing the circumstances surrounding the assistant’s fateful action, particularly his relationship with the woman he loves and ultimately marries. The fantastic premise of immortality leads to a number of satirical exaggerations by which patriarchal gender representations are thrown into confusion.

By assigning the immortality to a male narrator, Shelley’s text turns it into a fantastic trope for male power, initiating a critique of patriarchy which resembles Mary Wollstonecraft’s. In A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) Wollstonecraft argues that the “bodily strength [which] seems to give man a natural superiority over woman [...] is the only solid basis on which the superiority of the sex can be built” (Wollstonecraft 1975: 124). Shelley’s fantastic narrative questions male physical superiority by setting up the assistant as the unstable position from which the action becomes intelligible. There is doubt about whether he is in fact physically superior. His “story” is framed by the fundamental question, “Am I immortal?” (Shelley 1976: 219, 229), and interrupted by several inconclusive meditations on the authenticity and effectiveness of Cornelius’s elixir. The value of male physical superiority is unsettled by the assistant's contradictory representation of the alchemical science that may have made him immortal. At first, alchemy is stigmatized as unnatural and heretical. We hear the "report" of the "accident" involving Cornelius's "scholar, who, unawares, raised the foul fiend during his master's absence and was destroyed," with the result that "all his scholars at once deserted him," and "the dark spirits laughed at him for not being able to retain a single mortal in his service" (ibid.: 219–20). The assistant seems to accept this association of alchemy with witchcraft: "when Cornelius came and offered me a purse of gold if I would remain under his roof, I felt as if Satan himself tempted me" (ibid.: 220). In the midst of this passage, however, he drops the suggestion that the "report" may be "true or false" (ibid.: 219); and later in the narrative, after Cornelius dies, this skepticism reappears to exculpate the alchemist – and reinforce the doubt concerning the assistant's immortality:

I derided the notion that he could command the powers of darkness, and laughed at the superstitious fears with which he was regarded by the vulgar. He was a wise philosopher, but had no acquaintance with any spirits but those clad in flesh and blood.

(Ibid.: 226)

The uncertainty which Shelley's text generates about male physical superiority is maintained by the characterization of the assistant. He is a weak, vacillating figure, dominated by the woman he loves, at times ridiculous, a most unlikely candidate for immortality. His name is "Winzy," which, as Charles Robinson observes, is related to "winze," the Scottish word for curse, but which also "might suggest that the protagonist of this story is a comic character" (Shelley 1976: 390). After listening to his friends' "dire tale" of the "accident," Winzy's reaction to Cornelius's offer of employment is sheer slapstick: "My teeth chattered – my hair stood on end: – I ran off as fast as my trembling knees would permit" (ibid.: 220). Winzy's characterization satirizes the ideological basis of patriarchy in biological determinism because his physical superiority is not innate, but an error: he drinks the elixir of immortality only because Cornelius has deceptively told him that it is a philter to cure love. Since part of the comedy in Winzy's character derives from his utter lack of psychological control, the satire also extends to a distinctively bourgeois version of patriarchal ideology, the link between male power and the individualistic concept of the free, unified subject. Winzy's fearful retreat from Cornelius's workshop leaves him with so little presence of mind that he lapses into poverty and must be browbeaten by his love Bertha in order to return to work: "Thus encouraged – shamed by her – led on by love and hope, laughing at my late fears, with quick steps and a light heart, I returned to accept the offers of the alchemist, and was instantly installed in my office" (ibid.: 220–1). Because Winzy is so submissive to Bertha, so cowed by the fear of her rejection, he endures her "inconstancy" and can gain the "courage and resolution" to act only when he is deceived that the potion he drinks cures him of his unhappy love (ibid.: 221, 224).

Winzy never possesses the inner autonomy of male power; he is in fact a man who does not want any power, who by the end of his narrative deeply regrets his longevity.

Shelley's tale follows Wollstonecraft's feminist critique most closely in the characterization of Bertha. Just as Wollstonecraft finds male domination most oppressive of women in the affluent classes because "the education of the rich tends to render them vain and helpless" (Wollstonecraft 1975: 81), so Shelley's text marks an unfortunate change in Bertha when her parents die and she is adopted by "the old lady of the near castle, rich, childless, and solitary" (Shelley 1976: 220). Living in the aristocratic splendor of a "marble palace" and "surrounded by silk-clad youths – the rich and gay," Bertha becomes "somewhat of a coquette in manner," and her relationship with the poor Winzy is endangered (ibid.: 220–1). Women develop "coquettish arts," Wollstonecraft argues, because they assimilate the patriarchal image of themselves as the passive object of male desire: "only taught to please, women are always on the watch to please, and with true heroic ardour endeavor to gain hearts merely to resign or spurn them when the victory is decided and conspicuous" (Wollstonecraft 1975: 115, 147). Hence Bertha's change is manifested in her devious and perverse manipulation of Winzy:

Bertha fancied that love and security were enemies, and her pleasure was to divide them in my bosom. [...] She slighted me in a thousand ways, yet would never acknowledge herself to be in the wrong. She would drive me mad with anger, and then force me to beg her pardon. Sometimes she fancied that I was not sufficiently submissive, and then she had some story of a rival, favoured by her protectress.

(Shelley 1976: 221)

As this catalogue of abuse suggests, Shelley's tale satirizes the patriarchal image of woman that shapes Bertha's characterization by transforming it into caricature. The fantastic premise of immortality results in an exaggeration of her vanity: as Winzy remains 20 years old and she becomes a "faded beauty" of 50, "she sought to decrease the apparent disparity of our ages by a thousand feminine arts – rouge, youthful dress, and assumed juvenility of manner" (ibid.: 226, 228). The constant concern with beauty that patriarchy forces on women in Wollstonecraft's critique is magnified into Bertha's ludicrous, maddening obsession: "Her jealousy never slept," Winzy relates:

Her chief occupation was to discover that, in spite of outward appearances, I was myself growing old. [...] She would discern wrinkles in my face and decrepitude in my walk, while I bounded along in youthful vigour, the youngest looking of twenty youths. I never dared address another woman: on one occasion, fancying that the belle of the village regarded me with favouring eyes, she bought me a gray wig.

(Ibid.: 228)

Unable to maintain her attractive appearance, Bertha even goes so far as to disparage youth and beauty:

she described how much more comely gray hairs were than my chestnut locks; she descanted on the reverence and respect due to age – how preferable to the slight regard paid to children: could I imagine that the despicable gifts of youth and good looks outweighed disgrace, hatred, and scorn?

(Ibid.: 227)

Tarchetti's "L'elixir dell'immortalità" is a rather close translation which perfectly catches the humor of Shelley's feminist satire, but he also made revisions which go beyond the English text. Some of the revisions suggest a strategy of amplification designed to increase the epistemological confusion of the fantastic for the Italian reader (the italicized words in the Italian quotations below indicate Tarchetti's additions to the English text). Thus the translation heightens the marvelous register of Shelley's fantastic discourse by adding a strong tendency towards sensationalism. Tarchetti followed the English by initiating the fantastic hesitation in the first sentence, with a date that glanced at the Italian reader's reality, yet he inserted slight changes that intensify the narrator's amazement:

Dicembre 16, 1867. – È questo per me un anniversario assai memorabile. Io compio oggi il mio trecentoventinovesimo anno di vita.

(Tarchetti 1967: I, 114)

[December 16, 1867. – This is a very memorable anniversary for me. Today I complete my three hundred and twenty-ninth year of life.]

Winzy's first expression of doubt about his physical superiority is the simple question, "Am I, then, immortal?" (Shelley 1976: 219), whereas the Italian version resorts to a more emphatic restatement: "Ma non invecchierò io dunque? Sono io dunque realmente immortale?" ("But shall I not age, then? Am I, then, really immortal?") [Tarchetti 1967: I, 114]. Sometimes the amplification produces a melodramatic effect: "belief" and "thought" (226) are inflated into the more stagy "illusione" and "dubbio" ("dream" and "suspicion" [I, 126]); "sad" (224) is rendered by "pazza" ("mad" [I, 124]), "fondly" – as in "my Bertha, whom I had loved so fondly" (228) – by "pazzamente" ("madly" [I, 129]). And sometimes the melodrama tips into the marvelous. When the aged Bertha tries to salve her wounded vanity by telling Winzy that "though I looked so young, there was ruin at work within my frame," the Italian version turns the "ruin" into a preternaturally abrupt process: "quantunque io apparissi così giovane, eravi qualche cosa in me che m'avrebbe fatto invecchiare repentimente" ("although I looked so young, there was something in me which would make me age all of sudden" [I, 130]).

At other points, Tarchetti's translation increases the Italian reader's epistemological confusion by strengthening the mimetic register of Shelley's fantastic discourse. The main characters are rechristened Vincenzo and Ortensia, two quite ordinary Italian names which remove the comic improbability suggested by an immortal called Winzy. Tarchetti's strategy of mimetic amplification works by accumulating verisimilar details and explanations. When Vincenzo recounts the tragedy of Cornelius's "allievo che avendo inavvertentemente evocato durante l'assenza del maestro, uno spirito maligno, ne fu ucciso" ("pupil who having inadvertently raised a malign spirit in his master's absence was killed by it"), Tarchetti added another detail to the English passage to make the incident more plausible: "senza che alcuno avesse potuto soccorrerlo" ("before anyone could come to his aid" [I, 115]). The Italian version similarly enhances the psychological realism of the English text. When Winzy and Bertha part after their first falling out, he tersely states that "we met now after an absence, and she had been sorely beset while I was away" (220). In the translation, however, the meeting is much more histrionic, with Vincenzo physically expressing his passion for Ortensia and emphasizing the distress caused by their separation:

Io la riabbracciava ora dopo un'assenza assai dolorosa; il bisogno di confidenza e di conforti mi aveva ricondotto presso di lei. La fanciulla non aveva sofferto meno di me durante la mia lontananza.

(I, 117)

[I embraced her again now after a very painful absence; the need for intimacy and comfort led me back to her. The girl had not suffered less than me during my distance.]

Because the translation tends to favor extreme emotional states, this sort of mimetic amplification easily turns a relatively realistic English passage into overwrought fantasy. When Winzy fearfully runs away from the allegedly satanic Cornelius, he turns to Bertha for consolation: "My failing steps were directed whither for two years they had every evening been attracted, – a gently bubbling spring of pure living waters, beside which lingered a dark-haired girl" (220). The Italian version infuses the landscape and the girl with Gothic overtones:

I miei passi si diressero anche quella volta a quel luogo, a cui pel giro di due anni erano stati diretti ogni sera, – un luogo pieno d'incanti, una sterminata latitudine di praterie, con una sorgente d'acqua viva che scaturiva gorgogliando malinconicamente, e presso la quale sedeva con abbandono una fanciulla.

(I, 116)

[My steps were directed that time as well towards that place, where for a period of two years they had been directed every evening, – a place full of enchantments, a boundless expanse of grassland, with a fountain of living water which gushed with a melancholy gurgling, and beside which sat a girl with abandon.]

Tarchetti's strategy of amplification effectively reproduces Shelley's feminist critique by further exaggerating the patriarchal gender images which shape the characters. When Winzy drinks what he mistakenly assumes is a remedy for his frustrated love of Bertha, he experiences a sudden fit of self-esteem and daring which comically confirms his psychological weakness, thus continuing the satire of male power: "methought my good looks had wonderfully improved. I hurried beyond the precincts of the town, joy in my soul, the beauty of heaven and earth around me" (223). The Italian version turns Vincenzo into a parody of the romantic individual, narcissistic, chest-thumping, Byronic:

parvemi che i miei occhi, già così ingenui, avessero acquistata una sorprendente espressione. Mi cacciai fuori del recinto della città colla gioia nell'anima, con quella orgogliosa soddisfazione che mi dava il pensiero di essere presto vendicato.

(I, 122)

[it seemed to me that my eyes, previously so ingenuous, had acquired a striking expression. I dashed beyond the city limit with joy in my heart, with that proud satisfaction which made me think that I would soon be avenged.]

The translation likewise accentuates the caricature of female vanity. Whereas Winzy observes that his youthfulness drove Bertha to find "compensation for her misfortunes in a variety of little ridiculous circumstances" (228), Ortensia is said to revert to "puerili e ridicole circostanze" ("childish and ridiculous circumstances" [I, 129]). And whereas Winzy states that Bertha "would discern wrinkles in my face and decrepitude in my walk" (228), Vincenzo complains that Ortensia "struggeasi di scoprire delle grinze sul mio viso, e qualche cosa di esitante, di decrepito nel mio incasso" ("was consumed with discovering wrinkles in my face, and something hesitant, decrepit in my gait" [I, 130]).

4 Translation as ideological critique

Tarchetti's first decisive departure from the ideological determinations of Shelley's tale occurs on the issue of class. Shelley challenges the patriarchal assumption that gender identity is biologically fixed by indicating that Bertha's transformation into a coquette is socially determined, an effect of her upward mobility. Bertha's class position is evidently bourgeois: "her parents, like mine," states Winzy, "were of humble life, yet respectable" (220). This "life" should be seen as bourgeois even though "humble," not only because it is labelled "respectable," but because it enables Winzy to be apprenticed to an alchemist with whom he earns "no insignificant sum of money" (221). Bertha and Winzy are "humble" in relation to her protectress, who is an aristocrat, a "lady" living in a feudal "castle." Shelley's tale thus begins by associating patriarchy with aristocratic domination, sexual equality with the bourgeois family. This is most clear in a striking passage which alludes explicitly to Wollstonecraft's treatise. When Bertha finally leaves her aristocratic protectress and returns to Winzy's parents, he asserts that she "escaped from a gilt cage to nature and liberty" (224), echoing one of Wollstonecraft's metaphors for the self-oppression to which patriarchal ideology subjects women: "Taught from their infancy that beauty is woman's sceptre, the mind shapes itself to the body, and roaming round its gilt cage, only seeks to adore its prison" (Wollstonecraft 1975: 131).

As the narrative unfolds, however, the class logic of Shelley's feminist critique is undone. Although Winzy's attack on the aristocratic protectress implicitly equates the bourgeois family with a natural state free of patriarchal gender representations, his own marriage to Bertha compels her to live them out in an even more obsessive way. They continue to be financially independent: Winzy refers to "my farm" (Shelley 1976: 227), and although at one point "poverty had made itself felt" because his perpetual youthfulness caused them to be "universally shunned," they are nonetheless able to sell off their "property" and emigrate to France, having "realised a sum sufficient, at least, to maintain us while Bertha lived" (ibid.: 228). Thus, whether living with their parents or on their own, after they are married, they continue to lead a "humble life, yet respectable." But their relationship can hardly be considered "nature and liberty" for either of them. Bertha becomes the passive object of Winzy's desire:

We had no children; we were all in all to each other; and though, as she grew older, her vivacious spirit became a little allied to ill-temper, and her beauty sadly diminished, I cherished her in my heart as the mistress I had idolized, the wife I had sought with such perfect love.

(Ibid.: 227)

And when Bertha's vanity drives her to ridiculous, alienating extremes, Winzy helplessly acknowledges the gender hierarchy established by his physical superiority: "this mincing, simpering, jealous old woman. I should have revered her gray locks and withered cheeks; but thus! – It was my work, I knew; but I did not the less deplore this type of human weakness" (ibid.: 228). Bertha's return to the bourgeoisie ultimately contradicts Winzy's attack on the protectress: their marriage shows that the bourgeois family is not an egalitarian refuge from aristocratic patriarchy, but a continuation of male dominance.

This ideological contradiction lies at the center of Shelley's feminism. As Anne Mellor has argued,

Mary Shelley was a feminist in the sense that her mother was, in that she advocated an egalitarian marriage and the education of women. But insofar as she endorsed the continued reproduction of the bourgeois family, her feminism is qualified by the ways in which her affirmation of the bourgeois family entails an acceptance of its intrinsic hierarchy, a hierarchy historically manifested in the doctrine of separate spheres [and] in the domination of the male gender.

(Mellor 1988: 217)

Shelley's characteristic valorization of marriage emerges in "The Mortal Immortal" primarily because Winzy is the narrator: he makes his love for Bertha and their marriage the positions from which their actions are intelligible, and hence the bourgeois family, with its patriarchal construction of gender, is established as the standard by which they are judged. What the text imposes as true or obvious is that Winzy is the devoted lover and husband, attending to their material needs, controlling their destiny in the public sphere, whereas Bertha controls their private life, compelled by her vanity to trifle with his affection, envy his youthfulness, even threaten their lives. Reasoning that Winzy's unchanging appearance could get them executed "as a dealer in the black art" and his "accomplice[,] at last she insinuated that I must share my secret with her, and bestow on her like benefits to those I myself enjoyed, or she would denounce me – and then she burst into tears" (Shelley 1976: 227).

Tarchetti's translation probes the contradictions of Shelley's feminism by subtly revising the ideologies her tale puts to work. The Italian follows the English in having Vincenzo assert that "io divenni marito di Ortensia" ("I became Ortensia's husband" [Tarchetti 1967: I, 123]), but it repeatedly omits signs of their marriage. When Bertha becomes aware of Winzy's immortality, he renews his conjugal vows to her: "I will be your true, faithful husband while you are spared to me, and do my duty to you to the last" (228). Tarchetti deletes this entire statement. And where Winzy and Bertha address each other with "my poor wife" and "my husband" (227, 228), Vincenzo and Ortensia say "mia buona compagna" and "mio amico" ("my good companion," "my friend" [I, 128]). These changes show an effort to weaken, however slightly, the valorization of marriage in Shelley's tale and perhaps reflect a scapigliato rejection of bourgeois respectability. Most significantly, Tarchetti's changes locate the very ideological determination which qualifies Shelley's feminist project, and they do so by emphasizing friendship rather than marriage, or friendship within marriage, hinting at the possibility of an equal relationship between the lovers, questioning the gender hierarchy of the bourgeois family.

At the same time, Tarchetti's translation superimposes another class conflict on the English text. This too requires a diminution of Shelley's bourgeois values. The Italian version reproduces all of those passages which point to the main characters' financial independence – except the most explicit one: the description of Vincenzo's and Ortensia's parents deletes "respectable" and emphasizes "humble," clearly suggesting that they are not bourgeois, but members of the working class: "I suoi parenti erano, come i miei, di assai umile condizione" ("Her parents were, like mine, of very humble rank" [I, 116]). Ortensia's adoption by the protectress thus figures patriarchy as aristocratic domination of the working class. The Italian version underscores this representation by encoding Ortensia's vain obsessions with aristocratic attitudes. Whereas Bertha, driven by her envy of Winzy's physical appearance to the paradoxical extreme of disparaging beauty, tells him that "gray hairs" are "much more comely," and that "youth and good looks" are "despicable gifts" (227), Ortensia expresses an aristocratic sense of social superiority: the Italian version replaces "comely" with "gentili" ("fair," but also "polite," "noble") and "despicable" with "volgari" ("common," "unrefined" [I, 127, 128]). With these changes, Tarchetti's translation forces Shelley's tale to address the hierarchical relationship between the aristocracy and the working class, an instance of class domination which her bourgeois feminism represses.

This pressure in the translation to expose forms of ideological mystification also makes itself felt in deletions which remove the Orientalism from Shelley's tale. Tarchetti omits Winzy's response to Bertha's coquettish behavior: "I was jealous as a Turk" (221). Because any particularly violent or aggressive show of jealousy would be comically inconsistent with Winzy's submissiveness, his assertion can be seen as contributing to the satire of male power built into his characterization. Yet once the feminist significance of the joke is appreciated, the reader is positioned in an another ideology, European Orientalism: the satire becomes intelligible only when the reader thinks that Winzy's jealousy could never possibly be as excessive as a Turk's, that is, only when the reader assumes the truth of the cliché and thus accepts an ethnic slur, drawing a racist distinction between the West as rational and the East as irrational. Shelley's use of the cliché to support the feminist satire ridicules a gender hierarchy by introducing one based on race.

The absence of this racial ideology from the Italian version might seem insignificant, were it not that Tarchetti omits another, much more complicated Orientalist reference in the English text: an allusion to The History of Nourjahad, an Eastern tale written by the eighteenth-century novelist and playwright Frances Sheridan. Near the beginning of Shelley's text, Winzy wistfully cites "fabled" instances of longevity which proved much more tolerable than his:

I have heard of enchantments, in which the victims were plunged into a deep sleep to wake, after a hundred years, as fresh as ever: I have heard of the Seven Sleepers – thus to be immortal would not be so burthensome; but, oh! the weight of never-ending time – the tedious passage of the still-succeeding hours! How happy was the fabled Nourjahad!

(Shelley 1976: 219)

The extremely elliptical quality of this allusion, especially compared to the explanatory statement that precedes the Seven Sleepers, indicates the enormous popularity of Sheridan's character, even as late as 1833, when Shelley was writing her own tale. Published in 1767, a year after Sheridan's death, The History of Nourjahad went through at least eleven British editions by 1830, including an illustrated abridgement for children, and it was twice adapted for the stage, first as a "melodramatic spectacle" in 1802, then as a musical production in 1813 (Todd 1985: 282–4). Having already published several tales in The Keepsake, Shelley knew that Oriental motifs were in vogue among its readers. She seems even to have assumed that the “fabled Nourjahad” was more familiar to them than the rather learned allusion to the Seven Sleepers, and so she needed merely to have her “mortal immortal” drop the character’s name to signify immortality punctuated by “deep sleep.”⁴ Yet for readers who know The History of Nourjahad the reference is too abrupt and unqualified to stop resonating, so that it constitutes a disturbing point of indeterminacy in Shelley’s text, limited only by the cultural and social conditions under which it is read.

Sheridan’s Nourjahad is the favorite of the Persian sultan Schemzeddin, who would like to appoint him as “first minister” but must establish that he is worthy, innocent of the faults imputed to him by court advisors: “youth,” “avarice,” “love of pleasure,” and “irreligion” (Weber 1812: 693). Schemzeddin tests Nourjahad by asking him what he would like if his every desire could be satisfied, and Nourjahad’s response confirms the advisors’ suspicions:

I should desire to be possessed of inexhaustible riches; and, to enable me to enjoy them to the utmost, to have my life prolonged to eternity, [disregarding] hopes of Paradise [in order to] make a paradise of this earthly globe while it lasted, and take my chance for the other afterwards.

Nourjahad elicits the sultan’s rebuke, and that night he is visited by his “guardian genius” who fulfills his desire for wealth and immortality, although with the proviso that any vice he commits will be “punished by total privation of [his] faculties,” lasting “for months, years, nay for a whole revolution of Saturn at a time, or perhaps for a century” (ibid.: 695). Nourjahad forgets this punishment, further alienates Schemzeddin by devoting himself to “nothing but giving loose to his appetites” (ibid.: 698), and performs three immoral acts which are each punished by long periods of deep sleep. While indulging himself “with an unbounded freedom in his most voluptuous wishes,” Nourjahad, “for the first time, got drunk,” whereupon he sleeps over four years (ibid.: 700); then he invents a “celestial masquerade” in which he orders “the women of his seraglio to personate the houris,” while “he himself would needs represent Mahomet; and one of the mistresses whom he loved best [...] Cadiga, the favourite wife of the great prophet,” for which “wild and profane idea” he sleeps forty years (ibid.: 705); finally, when his “appetites palled with abundance,” he begins to delight in “cruelty” and brutally kills Cadiga, thereafter sleeping twenty years (ibid.: 710). Upon waking Nourjahad reforms and embarks on a vast program of philanthropy, so profoundly regretting his wealth and immortality that his guardian genius reappears to take them away. It is subsequently revealed that Nourjahad’s “adventure [...] was all a deception” (ibid.: 719), he did not actually kill Cadiga, he was never wealthy or immortal, and only fourteen months have passed, not more than sixty years. Schemzeddin had invented everything to bring about his favorite’s moral reformation.

Shelley's allusion to Sheridan's tale puts into play several themes dense with ideological significance. Nourjahad appears "happy" to Winzy, most obviously, because the burden of his immortality was eased by long periods of sleep and finally removed. Yet given Winzy's relationship to Bertha, Nourjahad would also be enviable because he was finally reunited with and married to his beloved Mandana, "a young maid, so exquisitely charming and accomplished that he gave her the entire possession of his heart" (Weber 1812: 698). What distinguished Nourjahad's relationship to Mandana was that he chose her as his confidante – "longing to unbosom himself to one on whose tenderness and fidelity he could rely, to her he disclosed the marvellous story of his destiny" (ibid.) – thereby exemplifying the eighteenth-century rise of companionate marriage, which stressed domestic friendship, a sharing of affection and interests between the spouses, while maintaining the husband's authority (Stone 1977). It was no doubt this antecedent of Shelley's own concept of egalitarian marriage, in addition to the fantastic premise of immortality, that attracted her to Sheridan's tale, especially since it occurs within a narrative that can be read as a critique of patriarchy. For The History of Nourjahad, like "The Mortal Immortal," questions a patriarchal gender image: Nourjahad represents male physical superiority pushed to destructive extremes of violence against women. Hence, when Winzy compares himself to Nourjahad, Shelley's text signals that it will address gender differences and offers any reader of The Keepsake who could make the comparison and shared Wollstonecraft's thinking a feminist joke at Winzy's expense: the allusion inevitably points to the discrepancy between his cringing weakness and Nourjahad's potent excess, beginning the satire of male power that is Shelley's theme.

Yet whatever feminist design can be detected in Sheridan's tale is finally skewed by the racial and class ideologies that underwrite it. In interrogating patriarchy, The History of Nourjahad is clearly overdetermined by Orientalism: it simultaneously demonstrates and rehabilitates the moral inferiority of the East. Nourjahad's characterization involves the racist procedure of naturalizing ethnic stereotypes, grounding them in biology: "he was not of an active temper," "he was naturally choleric" (Weber 1812: 698, 700). And although Islam is treated reverentially, with Nourjahad receiving his most severe punishment for blaspheming the Qur'an, Sheridan's valorization of marriage is linked to an explicit privileging of the West and to a consistent representation of women as the object of male sexual desire – even in the context of companionate marriage. Thus Mandana's reciprocation of Nourjahad's love is described as "a felicity very rare among eastern husbands," and she is revealed to be Schemzeddin's gift to his favorite, freed from her status as the sultan's "slave" because she participated in his "contrivance" by impersonating Nourjahad's guardian genius and later joining his seraglio (ibid.: 698, 719–20). Insofar as Schemzeddin is responsible for Nourjahad's reformation, moreover, the narrative affirms a specific political institution, a despotic monarchy that relies on paternalistic interventions. The ideological configuration of Sheridan's tale, what can be called an Orientalist image of patriarchal despotism, jars against the bourgeois feminism that can be read out of Shelley's allusion, forcing Winzy's exclamation to precipitate still more contradictions in her project. “How happy was the fabled Nourjahad” – that he lived under a despot who exercised absolute power over his subjects? That he dominated his wife as well as the women in his seraglio? That he was a Persian who overcame his Oriental propensity to vice? These potential meanings would have been accessible to readers of The Keepsake: the audience for these expensive giftbooks was largely aristocratic and bourgeois women, politically conservative, accustomed to prose and poetry that was often Orientalist and filled with patriarchal constructions of gender (Faxon 1973: xxi; Altick 1957: 362–3).

Although The History of Nourjahad enjoyed some popularity on the Continent during the late eighteenth century, when it was translated into French, Russian, and Hungarian, it seems unlikely that Tarchetti knew it. His deletion of any reference to Nourjahad from his translation may have been merely due to his ignorance of Sheridan’s tale. He certainly did not remove it because he was aware of and opposed Orientalist stereotypes, since the same racial ideology surfaces elsewhere in his writing, even when he tries to formulate a democratic cultural politics for Italian fiction. Whatever Tarchetti’s motive may have been, his deletion necessarily affects both the English text and the Italian translation. The mere absence of the allusion at once isolates a node of ideological contradiction in Shelley’s text and erases it, allowing the translation to address class and gender domination in Italy without the burden of racism and despotic monarchy. Yet the absence also points to an antifeminist effect in the translation because of the cultural and social functions that every allusion performs. As Susan Stewart has argued, the allusive act always bears reference to and creates tradition, [but] it also always bears reference to and creates the situation at hand, articulating the relation between that situation and tradition, and articulating the varying degrees of access available to tradition[,] levels of readership, levels of accessibility to knowledge.

Shelley’s allusion to Sheridan’s tale not only announces her own project as a feminist critique of patriarchy, but implicitly constructs a tradition of female authorship and feminist ideological critique, even as the revelation of that tradition conceals its contradictory ideological conditions in both writers’ texts. Shelley’s allusion, furthermore, makes the tradition available to the socially prominent women who read The Keepsake and were singled out by Wollstonecraft as most oppressed by patriarchy. Tarchetti’s deletion quashes this act of feminist traditionalization, entirely blocking the Italian reader’s access to the tradition it constructs.

Tarchetti’s translation sets up two discontinuous relationships, one with Shelley’s tale, the other with Italian culture, which can best be understood with Philip Lewis’s concept of abusive fidelity. In this sort of translation, Lewis states, the translator focuses on the “abuses” of the foreign text, “points or passages that are in some sense forced, that stand out as clusters of textual energy,” and attempts to reproduce their abusive quality in the translating culture (Lewis 1985: 43). The translator’s attempt at reproduction, however, simultaneously supplements the foreign text in an interrogative way. This concept of fidelity in translation is abusive because it performs what Lewis calls a dual function – on the one hand, that of forcing the linguistic and conceptual system of which it is a dependent, and on the other hand, of directing a critical thrust back toward the text that it translates and in relation to which it becomes a kind of unsettling aftermath (it is as if the translation sought to occupy the original’s already unsettled home, and thereby, far from ‘domesticating’ it, to turn it into a place still more foreign to itself).

(Ibid.)

Lewis seems to regard abusive fidelity as a strategic choice, at least partly within the translator’s control (“partly” because the choices are contingent, varying from one foreign text to another, from one translating culture to another). Yet the foregoing treatment of Tarchetti’s translation requires a revision of Lewis’s concept to include translation choices that remain unarticulated and unconscious, and that therefore can support an effect exceeding the translator’s intention. Any of the translator’s moves, in other words, may both reproduce and supplement the foreign text.

Tarchetti’s translation, with its formal techniques of marvelous and mimetic amplification, reproduces the key abuse in Shelley’s feminist fictional project, her use of the fantastic to dislocate patriarchal gender representations; and because his translation is a plagiarism written in the standard Italian dialect, it deterritorializes the dominant realist discourse in Italy, where it conducts an ideological cultural practice which is radically democratic, which combats class (aristocratic and bourgeois), gender (patriarchal), and racial (Orientalist) ideologies. Tarchetti’s translation moves are such that they exhibit this political agenda even in instances (e.g. the removal of Shelley’s Orientalism) where they seem to be uncalculated or at least to lack a political calculation.

The abusiveness of Tarchetti’s translation does not stop with the receiving culture, for it also enacts an “unsettling” ideological critique of Shelley’s tale, exposing the political limitations of her feminism, its failure to recognize the gender hierarchy in the bourgeois marriage and its concealment of working-class oppression and European racism. The paradox of Tarchetti’s translation practice is that its abuses issue mostly from its manifold fidelities – to the standard Italian dialect, but not to the dominant realism; to the syntactical and lexical features, fantastic discourse, and feminist ideology of the English text, but not to its bourgeois values and Orientalism. These lacks in Tarchetti’s translation are supplied by another fidelity, to a democratic cultural politics.

More specifically, the attention to class in Tarchetti’s translation provides one example of how his use of the fantastic was designed to confront class divisions that were altered but nonetheless maintained after the Italian Unification. This social transformation was ultimately liberalizing, not democratizing: it freed markets from regional restrictions and encouraged the development of professional, manufacturing, and mercantile interests, particularly in the north, yet without markedly improving the lives of the agrarian and industrial workers who composed the largest segment of the population. On the contrary, the economic reorganization, instead of weakening workers' dependence on landowners and employers, added the uncertainties of market conditions, of higher prices and taxes. And the institution of a national government with a standing army faced workers with conscription while their widespread illiteracy hindered their participation in the political process (Smith 1969). Tarchetti's translation, like his other fantastic tales, intervenes into these social contradictions, not only by criticizing aristocratic and bourgeois domination of the working classes, but by adopting a fictional discourse that overturns the bourgeois assumptions of realism. He made this intervention, moreover, in the highly politicized cultural formation of the 1860s, publishing his tales in Milanese periodicals that were closely allied to the most progressive, democratic groups and thus reaching the northern bourgeoisie who stood to benefit most from the economic and political changes in post-Unification Italy (Portinari 1989: 232–40; Castronovo et al. 1979).

Yet Tarchetti's reliance on plagiarism to forward his political agenda, as well as his deletion of a literary allusion he probably did not understand, gives a final twist to Lewis's concept of abusive fidelity in translation. Both moves show that the foreign text can cause "a kind of unsettling aftermath" in the translation, indicating points where the latter is "foreign" to its own project or where it conflicts with the translator's intention. As soon as Tarchetti's theft is known and his deletion located, Shelley's tale enacts an ideological critique of his translation which reveals that he imported her feminist fiction into Italy with some violence, suppressing her authorship and her construction of a feminist literary tradition. The antifeminist effects of Tarchetti's text constitute an egregious reminder that translation, like every cultural practice, functions under conditions that may to some extent be unacknowledged, but that nonetheless complicate and perhaps compromise the translator's activity – even when it aims to make a strategic political intervention.

5 Foreignizing translation and literary canons

For the English-language translator who seeks forms of resistance against the current regime of fluent domestication, Tarchetti exemplifies a foreignizing translation practice that operates on two levels simultaneously, that of the signified as well as the signifier. His discursive strategy deviated from the dominant realism by releasing the play of the signifier: he amplified the two registers in Shelley's fantastic narrative, the mimetic and the marvelous, and thus forced an uncertainty over the metaphysical status of the representation (is the elixir "real" or not?), preempting the illusion of transparency. Yet Tarchetti's plagiarism also produced the illusion of his authorship: he effaced the second-order status of his translation by presenting it as the first Gothic tale written in the Italian of the dominant realist discourse, establishing his identity as an oppositional writer, fixing the meaning of his text as dissident. Like the contemporary writer of fluent translations, Tarchetti was invisible to his readers as a translator. Yet this very invisibility enabled him to conduct a foreignizing translation practice in his Italian situation because he was visible as an author.

Tarchetti's translation practices cannot be imitated today without significant revision. Plagiarism is largely excluded by copyright laws that bind translators as well as authors, resulting in contracts designed to insure that the translation is in fact a translation, and that it does not involve the unlicensed use of any copyrighted material. Here is a sampling of standard clauses from translation contracts issued over the past thirty years,⁵ including those wherein the translator is termed the "author" of the translation:

You warrant that your work will be original and that it does not infringe upon the copyright or violate the right of any person or party whatsoever.

The Author warrants that he has full power to make this agreement; that the Work has not previously been published in book form in the English language; that all rights conveyed to the Publisher hereunder are free of encumbrances or prior agreements; that the Work does not violate any copyright in any way.

Author warrants that he is the sole author of the Work; that he is the sole owner of all the rights granted to the Publisher.

The shrewdness and sheer audacity of Tarchetti's plagiarism may make it attractive to dissidents in British and American literary cultures – especially dissident translators interested in upsetting current practices in the publishing industry. Yet the fact remains that to publish an unauthorized translation of a copyrighted foreign text is to invite legal proceedings whose cost can far exceed the translator's income from even a bestselling translation.

What the contemporary English-language translator can learn from Tarchetti is not how to plagiarize a foreign text, but how to choose one to translate. Tarchetti shows that foreignizing translation takes the form, not just of deviant translation strategies, but also of foreign texts that deviate from dominant literary canons in the receiving culture. Tarchetti's choice to translate Shelley's Gothic tale was foreignizing in its introduction of a fictional discourse that challenged the dominant realism, and his translation, along with the few other Italian translations of foreign fantasies that had already been published, initiated a change in literary taste that culminated in a significant canon reformation. Other members of the scapigliatura, notably Arrigo and Camillo Boito and Emilio Praga, published Gothic tales in the 1860s, and Italian translations of foreign writers like Poe, Gautier, and Erckmann-Chatrion increased rapidly during the remainder of the nineteenth century. Hoffmann's tales, for example, appeared in eight different Italian editions between 1877 and 1898 (Costa and Vignini 1991; Rossi 1959). It is partly as a result of these trends that the fantastic became a dominant discourse in twentieth-century Italian fiction, modernist as well as postmodernist, inspiring such diverse canonical writers as Luigi Pirandello, Massimo Bontempelli, Dino Buzzati, Tommaso Landolfi, and Italo Calvino (Bonifazi 1971 and 1982). The lesson Tarchetti teaches the dissident translator is that the choice of a foreign text for translation can be just as foreignizing in its impact on the receiving culture as the invention of a discursive strategy. In the case of prose fiction, the translator can select a foreign text whose fictional discourse or genre runs counter to the narrative forms that have achieved canonical status in the literary traditions of the translating language. At a time when deviations from a particularly narrow form of fluent translating may limit the circulation of a translation or even prevent it from getting published in the first place, Tarchetti demonstrates the strategic value of discriminating carefully among foreign texts and literatures when a translation project is devised.

This point might be developed further if we turn to Anglophone cultures and apply it to specific cases. In British and American literary traditions, where realism has long prevailed as the dominant fictional discourse, a translator can devise a foreignizing project by selecting foreign texts that experiment with realism, possibly by undermining its illusionism through self-reflexivity, or that abandon it for varieties of fantasy. These criteria for selection were in effect adopted by the first translators and publishers of Latin American fiction during the 1960s, whose work resulted in a new canon of foreign literature in English distinguished by "magical realism" (see below, pp. 227–8). Yet such a canon always emerges after a discernible pattern of reception has taken shape, establishing a degree of recognizability or familiarity for a particular foreign literature in translation, so that the dissident translator must subsequently locate a neglected or deviant set of formal and thematic features in that literature to signal anew its linguistic and cultural differences. The canon of Latin American literature in English had excluded women fiction writers, especially those who did not write varieties of fantasy, and their work could thus produce foreignizing effects in translation (see Venuti 1998: 169–70).

Given the dominance of realism in British and American narrative traditions, however, we may well question whether realism itself can form the basis of a foreignizing translation project. Consider a recent trend in the publication of English translations that involves precisely a genre of realistic fiction: the crime novel. Since the 1990s British and American publishers have brought out an increasing number of foreign detective stories and police procedurals, new titles as well as reprints and revised editions of previously translated works. Whereas for much of the twentieth century translations of foreign fiction in this popular genre were rare, limited to such writers as the Belgian Georges Simenon and the Swedish couple Maj Sjöwall and Per Wahlöö, Anglophone readers can now sample crime novels from a broad and diverse range of foreign cultures, including Algeria, China, Cuba, France, Iceland, Italy, Japan, Norway, Russia, and Spain. The sheer quantity of translated crime fiction can only seem remarkable in the United Kingdom and the United States, cultures where translations have represented a minuscule percentage of total annual book output for over half a century. Between 2000 and 2007, for instance, approximately twenty-five crime novels by eight Italian writers appeared in English, almost equalling the contemporaneous translations of Italian fiction that does not fall into the crime genre. During the same period, approximately fifteen crime novels by six Norwegian writers appeared in English, far outstripping the other kinds of Norwegian fiction that were translated.

These translated crime novels have received a great deal of individual and collective attention through reviews and articles, whether in periodicals or online, and many have sold extremely well in both the UK and the US, among other Anglophone cultures. Stephen Sartarelli's translation of The Shape of Water (2002), the Italian writer Andrea Camilleri's first police procedural to appear in English, sold more than 60,000 copies within four years of publication; Stephen Snyder's translation of Out (2003), Japanese writer Natsuo Kirino's first thriller to be Englished, was issued in paperback in 2004 and within two years sold 67,000 copies in the UK alone (correspondence with Sartarelli and Snyder, 9 and 11 Oct. 2006). The Swedish writer Henning Mankell, whose crime novels started to appear in English in 1997, has achieved a much greater commercial success. In the UK the Harvill Press published the first four translations, and each sold approximately 12,000 copies in hardback and trade paperback as well as 45,000 copies in mass-market paperback; total UK sales to date have exceeded 100,000 for each novel (correspondence with Christopher MacLehose, 14 Jan. 2007).

These figures may seem small compared to the performance of an international bestseller by an American crime writer like Patricia Cornwell or John Grisham, whose novels can sell hundreds of thousands of copies in several foreign cultures simultaneously. Yet for an English translation sales beyond 10,000 copies must in fact be reckoned as astronomical. Christopher MacLehose, formerly director of Harvill, has observed that "for the most part now the majority of even the finest books that are translated find their way to sales between 1,500 and 6,000" (MacLehose 2004/5: 113).

The spate of foreign crime novels in English constitutes an unprecedented development in British and American publishing, not simply because their sales have been high, but because they belong to a popular genre. Since the Second World War translated foreign fiction has consisted mostly of elite literary works, usually with low sales. To sell at a high volume, the crime novels are undoubtedly reaching a wider audience, readers of genre fiction who would not ordinarily be attracted to foreign literature in translation as well as high-brow readers who include writers and academics. Inevitably this trend raises the question of whether the foreignness of the crime fiction is part of its attraction – or indeed whether any linguistic and cultural differences survive the translation and editing process.

Some publishers have explained the marketability of the translations by suggesting that they communicate information about foreign cultures in a fairly direct way. Edward Kastenmeier, director of Random House's Vintage Crime/Black Lizard imprint, has remarked that "if you're going to read a crime novel from another country, you're going to read it by and large because it tells you something about a culture you're not familiar with. And I think people love to see inside other cultures" (Paulson 2006). This logic seems dubious, however, particularly in light of the sales figures for most translations. If the "even finest books" can hope to sell no more than 6,000 copies when translated into English, readers must not be much interested in descriptions of foreign cultures presented in novels that don't belong to the crime genre. The popular audience is not crossing over to elite foreign literature, where, it might be argued, a more incisive representation of foreign cultures is likely to be found, unconstrained by the generic demands made by crime writing.

When a foreign culture is described in any genre of fiction, the description is informed not just by literary styles and discourses, genres and traditions, but by values, beliefs, and social representations that are fundamentally ideological, affiliated with the interests of individuals, groups, and institutions in that culture. In describing the appeal of foreign crime fiction Kastenmeier is likely to have in mind Sjöwall and Wahlöö, among other writers, since the police procedurals they wrote between 1965 and 1975 are now published in the US under his Random House imprint. Yet, as Sjöwall herself later made clear, these novels offer a time-bound image of Sweden that actually reflects the writers' leftwing social critique. "We wanted to show the reader," she said, that under the official image of welfare-state Sweden there was another layer where poverty, criminality and brutality existed beneath the glossy surface. We wanted to show which direction Sweden was heading in: toward a completely capitalistic, cold and inhuman society, where the rich got richer and the poor got poorer.

(Shephard 2006: 10)

Only a reader who had uncritically participated in the realist illusion would take Sjöwall and Wahlöö's novelistic descriptions of Swedish society at face value, simply as true representations. Translation complicates such descriptions by decontextualizing them, removing them from the social developments with which segments of the writers' first Swedish readership would have been acquainted, whether or not a reader shared their politics. Those developments would be unknown to most British and American readers at the time and ever since, so that any sense of Swedishness is reduced to place names and descriptions as well as the proper names chosen for characters. The crimes then become generalized, if not generic, and along with the possibility that they can happen elsewhere comes an appearance of familiarity.

A similar problem occurs in the work of the Swedish writer who can be called Sjöwall and Wahlöö's successor, Henning Mankell, although the politics of his crime fiction is much less coherent. In interviews Mankell has repeatedly indicated that he bases his plots on real social problems. Faceless Killers, his 1997 debut in English, explores the racism that greeted immigrants to Sweden in the late 1980s, and that he himself witnessed when he returned to the country in 1989 after an absence (Gerrard 2003). His police officer, Inspector Kurt Wallander, must solve the brutal murder of an elderly farmer and his wife, who dies with the word "foreign" on her lips (Mankell 2003a: 41). Wallander opposes what he describes as the government's "arbitrary, lax policy that allows anyone at all, for any reason at all, to cross the border into Sweden" (ibid.: 44). But when racists belonging to a nationalist movement randomly murder a Somali at a refugee camp and Wallander learns that his daughter is dating a Kenyan medical student, his conservative attitude is put into question. Most Anglophone readers would be entirely unfamiliar with the history of Swedish immigration policy and patterns, so that the cultural specificity and force of Mankell's critique of racism would be lost on them. They could not possibly respond to the translation as a Swedish reader would have responded to the Swedish text upon its publication in 1991. Yet because the problem of racism is not specific to Sweden, this theme can travel into other cultures, and readers from different linguistic communities might succumb to the equivocal means that Mankell uses to generate suspense: the novel provokes and thereby reinforces the reader's anxiety about immigrant crime even as it seeks to question the ethnic stereotyping on which that anxiety rests. When the murderers of the farmer and his wife are finally discovered, Mankell's critique falls into contradiction: the "faceless killers" turn out to be Czech immigrants, a revelation that risks yet another ethnic stereotype – regardless of the reader's culture.

Interestingly, Mankell's Swedish text portrays Wallander's ambivalence through a shifting racial lexicon. He uses four different terms to describe people of African descent: "färgade kvinna," or "colored woman"; "negress," which might be translated into English as "negro woman"; "svart," or "black man"; and "Afrikanen," or African man. Throughout the novel Wallander, a recent divorcé, dreams of "making fierce love" with a "black woman" and consistently refers to her as "färgade," a neutral term that by the 1980s had become standard for Africans and was widely used in the mass media and by educated Swedes (Mankell 1991: 14; 2003a: 17; my comments on the racial terms rely on correspondence with Laurie Thompson and Helge Niska, 22 Feb. and 20 April 2007). On one occasion, Wallander has a more complicated erotic fantasy in which he first superimposes the public prosecutor Anette Brolin onto his ex-wife and then transforms the attractive but unyielding Brolin into a "negress," an older usage that can carry negative connotations (Mankell 1991: 118). When Wallander spots his daughter's Kenyan boyfriend on the street, he uses the word "svart" and even "Afrikanen," where "svart" is a term adopted by younger, more progressive Swedes (ibid.: 151, 152). Mankell's lexicon displays the subtle nuances in Wallander's racial attitudes, inflected by the policeman's own desires and relationships as well as recent immigration patterns. These nuances are lost in Steven T. Murray's English version, which merely substitutes the generally acceptable word "black" for every Swedish term. What becomes most apparent in the translation, then, is Wallander's sexual fetish for race.

As these verbal choices suggest, English translations of foreign crime novels have tended to mystify the loss of the foreign social context through discursive strategies that assimilate the foreign text to dominant linguistic values in the UK and the US, to forms of English that are most acceptable and familiar to Anglophone readerships. At Harvill MacLehose routinely submitted the novels to what he called "a tolerable degree of naturalisation" by recasting them in British English – even when they were translated by Americans. "American translations we have always edited back into English," he has written, "so that Prague be not paved with sidewalks, so that the floor numbers in European buildings are appropriate" (MacLehose 2004/5: 107). Thus the American translator Murray's versions of Mankell's novels were initially commissioned by the New York-based New Press, but when the UK rights were bought by Harvill, the translations were extensively Britishized. Not only was the spelling brought in line with British conventions (e.g. "tyres," "vigour"), but the lexicon was changed to British usage, so that words like "boot," "lift," "petrol," and "torch" replaced "trunk," "elevator," "gasoline," and "flashlight." The Harvill editions of Murray's translations were subsequently bought by Vintage Crime/Black Lizard and reissued in the US, although without restoring his American English. The language remained so recognizably British that after Murray's version of Mankell's novel Sidetracked won the Gold Dagger from the UK Crime Writers Association in 2001, he came to be regarded as a British translator and stopped receiving commissions from American publishers (correspondence with Murray, 11 April 2007).

The editing performed on Murray's translations cannot be seen as merely naturalizing the language for a particular audience. Verbal choices in a literary translation are interpretive moves that when made with a novel can substantially alter formal features like narrative point of view and characterization so that they carry different meanings in the receiving culture. In the two English passages below, the first drawn from Murray's version of Mankell's Sidetracked for the New Press, the second from Harvill's edited version as reprinted by Vintage Crime/Black Lizard, Inspector Kurt Wallander reacts to the news that the prosecuting attorney Per Åkeson will be leaving Sweden to work on a United Nations project involving African refugees. Wallander is envious, expressing his regret that he must stay and solve the case of a young woman's gruesome suicide:

Han la på luren. En oväntad känsla av avundsjuka drabbade honom med full kraft. Han hade själv gärna rest till Uganda. Och gjort någonting helt annat. Inget kunde vara värre än att se en ung människa ta livet av sig som en bensinindränkt fackla. Han avundades Per Åkeson som inte bara låtit viljan till uppbrott stanna vid ord.

(Mankell 1995: 48)

He [Wallander] hung up. An unexpected feeling of jealousy hit him full force. He would have liked to travel to Uganda himself, to do something completely different. Nothing could be worse than seeing a young person commit suicide as a gasoline-soaked torch. He envied Per Åkeson, who wasn't going to let his desire to leave stop at mere words.

(Mankell 1999: 35)

He hung up. He felt a pang of jealousy. He would have liked to travel to Uganda himself, to have a complete change. Nothing could undo the horror of seeing a young person set herself alight. He envied Per Åkeson, who wasn't going to let his desire to escape stop at mere dreams.

(Mankell 2003b: 42)

The first version adheres much more closely to the Swedish text. It portrays Wallander as deeply affected by Åkeson's news ("An unexpected feeling of jealousy hit him full force"), admiring of the attorney's decision to embark on a humanitarian project outside the Swedish judicial system ("something completely different"), and unflinching in his description of the death ("a gasoline-soaked torch"). In the second version, however, Wallander seems to be much less moved by Åkeson's decision (he merely feels "a pang of jealousy"), he longs to abandon his job (he uses words like "escape" and "dreams," neither of which have any counterparts in the Swedish text), and he is squeamishly euphemistic about the suicide (he uses the phrase "set herself alight" even though the Swedish is specific about the means: "bensinindränkt"). The edited version brings an understatement to Wallander's character that might be construed as more British than Swedish (or American).

If the English translations cannot be seen as communicating the foreignness of the foreign texts in an untroubled way, the crime genre itself would appear to be a decisive factor in their commercial success. Yet since this genre is usually treated as native to British and American narrative traditions, here too we must question the extent to which the fiction retains any cultural difference in translation. More precisely, a canon of crime fiction had long been established in British and American literatures by the end of the twentieth century, and the most characteristic feature of the texts in this canon is a protagonist who solves a crime by discovering the criminal. From the origins of the genre in Poe and Arthur Conan Doyle through Agatha Christie and Dorothy L. Sayers, Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler, Mickey Spillane and Ruth Rendell, Walter Mosley and Ian Rankin, a private detective or police officer consistently creates the subject-position from which the action becomes intelligible to the reader and the realist illusion is produced. The reader is compelled to identify with this character to make sense of the plot, but also to interpret the data that lead to an explanation of the crime.

The canon continues to prevail today, decisively shaping popular taste, and its dominance can be measured in the most tangible form of sales. In a recent survey of buying patterns at Barnes and Noble, both at stores and online, The New York Times reported that “8 of the top 10 bestselling mysteries have featured long-lived detectives like J. D. Robb’s Eve Dallas and Elizabeth George’s Thomas Lynley,” concluding that “since the days of Sherlock Holmes, authors have deduced that the path to success lies in giving their fans book after book featuring their favorite sleuth” (Freierman 2006: C11). Crime fiction that lacks such a “sleuth” has tended to remain marginal in the UK and the US, even if it might eventually attain a compromised canonicity as a so-called cult classic. Notable examples include the American writers Patricia Highsmith and Jim Thompson, both of whom wrote thrillers that position the reader in the minds of criminals, usually psychopaths. Highsmith’s writing was critically acclaimed during her lifetime, but it never appealed to a wide American readership and so never achieved commercial success, with sales hovering around 8000 copies per book (Wilson 2003: 319). Many of Thompson’s novels were published as ephemeral paperback originals during the 1950s; at the time of his death in 1977, none were in print in the US (Polito 1995: 4). The reputations of these two writers have recently undergone reevaluation largely because their novels have become the object of film adaptations.

The British and American canon of crime fiction has exerted an enormous influence on foreign novels in the genre, including many that have been translated into English. Sjöwall and Wahlöö’s police procedurals with Inspector Martin Beck were modelled on the 87th Precinct novels that American writer Ed McBain began writing in the 1950s with New York police detective Steve Carella at their center. This connection has been pointed out by Henning Mankell, whose crime novels reveal the same influence in their depiction of Inspector Kurt Wallander (Mankell 2006: vi–vii). Yet Mankell goes much further in his characterization of Wallander: each novel accumulates more and more details about the inspector’s personal and professional lives, including his relationships to his elderly father and his unsettled daughter, the break-up of his marriage, his medical history, even his unhealthy diet. This elaborate development enhances the character’s appeal, strengthening both the reader’s identification and the realist illusion. “Women readers adore him,” Mankell told a British interviewer, “perhaps they sense he is needy” (Gerrard 2003). Reviewers have likewise mentioned the attractiveness of Wallander’s “emotional vulnerability” (Paulson 2006).

Merely in terms of narrative form, much of the foreign crime fiction that comprises the recent wave of English translations is so familiar that the decision to translate it can hardly be said to introduce a significant difference into British and American cultures. Despite the foreign settings and names, these novels tend to follow the conventions of the genre, especially the police procedural. They present a succession of detectives, inspectors, and superintendents, all possessing their own eccentricities and foibles, and the plots are formulaic, generating suspense by combining red herrings with productive clues (for a survey of the conventions see Cawelti 1976: 80–98). Indeed, publishers have chosen foreign crime novels for translation precisely because they share features with canonical

English-language texts in the genre. MacLehose has offered a revealing account of Harvill's policy:

Our own rules, as it were, for a crime novel at Harvill were, first, that it had to be in translation, second that it involved a crime and that the crime was (more or less) solved by a police detective and a team with all the modern supporting services.

(MacLehose 2006)

The only difference in Harvill's approach to the genre is precisely the insistence on translation, although their editing insured that this difference too would be minimized, if not erased, through their assimilation of the language to British norms.

In examining the recent trend in foreign crime fiction, I would describe the translations not as foreignizing, but as exoticizing, producing a translation effect that signifies a superficial cultural difference, usually with reference to specific features of the foreign culture ranging from geography, customs, and cuisine to historical figures and events, along with the retention of foreign place names and proper names as well as the odd foreign word. The English translations don't produce a foreignizing effect because they don't question or upset values, beliefs, and representations in Anglophone cultures, certainly not the canon of crime fiction. Reviewers of Mankell's novels most frequently mention the weather, sometimes giving it more attention than plot details. For Marilyn Stasio, who regularly reviews crime fiction for The New York Times, the weather seems to have been the most memorable feature of Mankell's novel The Fifth Woman (2000):

Clouded thoughts and heavy atmospheric pressures hang over Henning Mankell's international police procedurals, which feature a sternly pensive Swedish detective named Kurt Wallander, who works in Ystad, a southern city on the Baltic Sea where it seems to rain all the time. The bleak climate couldn't be more suitable for The Fifth Woman (New Press, $24.95), a chilling account of how a civilized nation can unwittingly breed a strain of brutality in its population.

(Stasio 2000: 18)

This shallow sense of the foreign eventually comes to be what readers expect of the translated crime fiction. But it also masks a narrative structure that avid readers of British and American crime novels would recognize as canonical, even native, to Anglophone literary traditions.

Nonetheless, some of the translated crime novels do signal linguistic and cultural differences in intriguing ways. They are foreignizing in their noticeable variation of the forms and themes of the genre. Some omit or somehow revise the conventional detective or police officer and focus instead on the criminal, resembling cult writers like Highsmith and Thompson. Kirino's Out concentrates on a group of Japanese women who work the grinding night shift in a lunch box factory and band together when one of them murders her abusive husband. In this tale of feminist solidarity, the women help the wife to dispose of the body, but the crime brings them into contact with a gangster, risking a violent confrontation. This summary, however rapid, suggests that Kirino's emphasis on the criminals doesn't merely alter the prevalent form of the genre, but also scrutinizes the social status of Japanese women from a leftwing standpoint. The Daily Telegraph glanced at this difference when listing the novel among the year's "Best Fiction," praising it as "a shockingly intense read that challenges assumptions about the submissiveness of Japanese women" (5 Dec. 2004).

Other translated crime novels give center stage to cultural and social issues that are truly specific to foreign countries, issues that at once resemble but defamiliarize developments in the UK and the US. Leonardo Padura Fuentes's Adiós Hemingway (2005) examines the American literary icon, although from a Cuban perspective. The novel inventively juxtaposes two narratives set in Cuba at different times, one involving the ailing Hemingway as he struggles with his waning creativity in the late 1950s, the other involving a police inspector who some forty years later comes out of retirement to solve the murder of an FBI agent in which the American writer is implicated. The crime becomes the occasion to demystify the heroic masculinity that governed Hemingway's career, the "machista fundamentalism" (Padura Fuentes 2005: 106) that proved to be so important for the inspector's own identity yet is finally shown to conceal the writer's dependence on the loyalty of his Cuban employees.

The foreign crime novels that are perhaps most foreignizing in translation offer detailed representations of social situations that differ markedly from the UK and the US. In Miyuke Miyabe's 1992 novel Kasha ("Cart of Fire"), a Tokyo homicide detective, Shunsuke Honma, agrees to track down his nephew's fiancée, Shoko Sekine, who abruptly disappears after her application for a credit card has been rejected. Sekine, Honma gradually discovers, has murdered and stolen another woman's identity in an effort to start a new life – only to learn that her victim had a similar past: both women had accumulated huge credit card debts and then became entangled in loan-sharking schemes that operate under the cover of helpful lending institutions, ultimately endangering their families' lives. The novel presents a powerful critique of Japanese consumerism, which is of course comparable to its Western counterpart yet is not only represented as more excessive and damaging to traditional communal values but exploited by a criminal underworld. Along the way the reader is given a glimpse of Japan's national registry, an unusual system that documents every citizen's movements but can be shrewdly manipulated to enable identity theft and murder.

Reviewers of the English version were quick to recognize the distinctiveness of Miyabe's social critique as well as its departures from the crime genre. The reviewer for the Christian Science Monitor remarked that "Miyabe's mystery is less a whodunit than a suspenseful guided tour through some of the challenges facing modern Japan: the downside of the consumer economy, changing roles for men and women, and evolving ideas about identity” (Barr 1997: 12). Miyabe also tampers with the representation of women in an Anglophone subgenre that has influenced her work, hard-boiled novels in which the detective is female. In a study of recent crime fiction by Japanese women, Amanda Seaman has pointed to how their “emphasis upon women’s economic vulnerability, the threat of male violence, and isolation contrasts with the network of interpersonal relations that characterizes Anglo-American women’s detective fiction” by writers like Sara Paretsky and Sue Grafton (Seaman 2004: 145–6). A reader familiar with their work will immediately notice the foreignness of the female identities constructed in Miyabe’s novel.

These formal and thematic differences are highlighted by Alfred Birnbaum’s extremely readable translation, entitled All She Was Worth (1996). Fluency here, however, does not hew to the current standard dialect, but is rather broadened to encompass a wide variety of colloquialisms, both lexical and syntactical. Some examples: “You had a run-in with a yakuza”; “like a bat out of hell”; “an easy in”; “They actually keep tabs on everybody”; “she took a spill”; “showed no sign of budging”; “she’s a real knockout”; “Mr. Right”; “plastic” as a term for credit cards; “so that deep-sixes this angle for the time being”; “get all dolled up” (Miyabe 1996: 14, 92, 122, 172, 173, 187, 200, 214, 215, 229, 267). When encountered in context, such language can be even more noticeable. In the course of his investigation, Honma questions a personnel manager at a “mail-order retailer of imported underwear” (ibid.: 187) where the imposter Sekine has briefly worked, and we get a description from the police detective’s point of view, cast in a slangy form of English:

Honma figured he was about thirty-four or thirty-five. Just this side of a playboy in looks, he had a perfectly even, if fairly discreet, artificial tan. His shirtsleeves gave him a casual look, but his shoes were no-nonsense business wingtips. It was the first time Honma had heard such a trendy yuppie type speak in everyday Osaka drawl. The two didn’t go together somehow.

(Ibid.: 188–9)

Although Birnbaum adheres closely to the Japanese at points – “wingtips,” for example, renders the Japanized form of the word – the language of this passage shows an increased informality (my comments on the Japanese text rely on correspondence with Amanda Seaman, 11 July 2007). “Playboy” translates “asobihito,” a Japanese word that connotes a familiarity with the pleasure quarters of the Tokugawa period, yet the English rendering loses the historical resonance and introduces distinctively Anglocentric connotations. The phrase “in looks” telescopes a more formal Japanese construction, while “trendy yuppie type” and “drawl” are additions to the Japanese text.

On the whole, Birnbaum’s style bears a striking resemblance to the language of crime novels in the hard-boiled tradition, including those that feature women detectives. Yet this intertextual connection, far from simply domesticating the Japanese text, brings into sharp focus what is different about Miyabe's novel, its culture-specific themes. The foreignizing effect can occur within a single sentence when the reader suddenly comes across the juxtaposition of English underworld argot with a Japanese word like "yakuza" (gangster) or "Osaka," an abrupt reminder of the different culture. Birnbaum's language thus frustrates the contemporary expectation that translations should be seamless, written in the most familiar and therefore most invisible form of the translating language.

The recent increase of foreign crime fiction in English shows quite clearly that patterns of selecting texts for translation tend to be informed by literary canons in the receiving culture where the decision to translate is usually made. Patterns of selection harden into canons of translated literatures, creating a sense of foreignness that is not simply domesticated, because assimilated to receiving cultural values, but incorporated into readers' expectations. Because literary traditions in the receiving culture possess cultural capital, they are likely to be so deeply ingrained in reading experiences that the foreign texts selected for translation may offer no more than an exoticism, a superficial difference that does not affect familiar cultural values. Popular literary genres might be considered as particularly susceptible to exoticizing effects because they work to solicit the reader's sympathetic identification so as to produce the realist illusion, an unreflective response that lacks critical detachment.

Yet the emergence of a canon of translated literature always establishes possibilities for foreignizing projects which the dissident translator can exploit by locating the forms and themes that have been marginalized. Moreover, the reviews of the translated crime fiction illustrate the fact that popular literature can be a site of linguistic and cultural differences in translation. Readers who read widely in a popular genre may come to expect conventional forms and themes, but for that very reason they are equipped with a specialized literary knowledge that can enable them to recognize significant innovations or deviations from the conventions. The commercial success that greeted the English version of Kirino's Out demonstrates that popular audiences can be receptive to foreignizing effects. This development should be taken as an incentive to translators, as well as their publishers, to adopt a more dissident attitude towards the values, beliefs, and representations that prevail in Anglophone cultures.

Margin

The translation of a poem having any depth ends by being one of two things: Either it is the expression of the translator, virtually a new poem, or it is as it were a photograph, as exact as possible, of one side of the statue.

Ezra Pound

The dominance of transparent discourse in English-language translation was decisively challenged at the start of the twentieth century, when modernism emerged in British and American literary cultures. The experimentation that characterized the literature of this period brought with it innovative forms of translation that avoided any notion of fluency tied to the current standard dialect by cultivating extremely heterogeneous discourses, principally in poetry translations, but also more widely in poetic composition. Translation now became a key practice in modernist poetics, motivating appropriations of various archaic and foreign poetics to serve modernist cultural agendas in English (see Hooley 1988; Yao 2002). At the same time, English-language translation theory attained a new level of critical sophistication, summoned as it was to rationalize specific modernist texts, poems that were translations as well as translations of poems.

But translation today bears little sign of these developments. The dominance of transparent discourse has remained so secure in English that even though modernist poetry and prose have long been canonized in British and American literary cultures, both in and out of the academy, the innovations that distinguish modernist translation practices continue to be marginal, seldom actually implemented in an English-language translation, seldom recommended in theoretical statements by translators or other commentators, seldom even given a coherent and incisive formulation by modernist translators themselves. In the search for exits from the dominance of transparency, it is important to assess the innovations of modernist translation, interrogating the cultural functions it performed with such force at the beginning of the century, but also the conditions of its marginalization from midcentury onward. What alternatives did modernist translation offer in its challenge to transparency? Why were they relegated to the fringes of Anglophone cultures?

I Modernism in translation

In a review published in the Criterion in 1936, Basil Bunting criticized E. Stuart Bates's study Modern Translation for not keeping the promise of its title, for failing, in fact, to present a modern concept of translation. In Bunting's view, Bates couldn't distinguish school "cribs (e.g. Loeb Classics) from translations" that Bunting himself valued, "translations meant to stand by themselves, works in their own language equivalent to their original but not compelled to lean on its authority, claiming the independence and accepting the responsibility inseparable from a life of their own" (Bunting 1936: 714). Modernism asserts the "independence" of the translated text, demanding that it be judged on its "own" terms, not merely apart from the foreign text, but against other literary texts in its "own" language, accepting the "responsibility" of distinguishing itself in the literary terms of that language. But as soon as a modernist translation chooses these terms, it can never be an independent work, can never be its "own" insofar as the translation is written in a language coded with cultural values that are fundamentally different from those circulating in the foreign language. Modernism believes that the responsibility of translation is to be independent, but the responsibility assumed in this belief is actually owed to an intelligibility and force in the translating language which erase, somewhat irresponsibly, the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text. For Bunting, these differences weren't the important thing in translation.

Modernism seeks to establish the aesthetic autonomy of the translated text by effacing its manifold conditions and exclusions, especially the process of domestication by which the foreign text is rewritten to serve modernist cultural agendas. Bunting was aware of this domestication. He praised Edward Fitzgerald's Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám (1859) because "Fitzgerald translated a poem that never existed, yet by an unforced, natural expansion of Dryden's aim, made Omar utter such things 'as he would himself have spoken if he had been born in England and in' an age still slightly overshadowed by Byron" (Bunting 1936: 715). For Bunting, Fitzgerald embodied the modernist ideal by appearing to translate a poem that "never existed," but paradoxically the translator drew on pre-existing materials: he followed Dryden's domesticating practice (which made Virgil a Restoration English poet), and his translation was noticeably influenced by Byron, Byronism, the Orientalism in romantic culture. Bunting's awareness of this domestication was never sufficiently skeptical to make him question his concept of translation, to doubt the autonomy of the translated text, or to wonder about what happened to the foreignness of the foreign text when it got translated. He was interested only in translation that makes a difference in the translating language, not translation that signifies the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text.

In modernist translation, these two kinds of difference get collapsed: the foreign text is inscribed with a modernist cultural agenda and then treated as the absolute value that exposes the inadequacy of translations informed by competing agendas. In a 1928 review of Arthur Symons's translation of Baudelaire, T. S. Eliot acknowledged that a translation constitutes an "interpretation," never entirely adequate to the foreign text because mediated by the receiving culture, tied to a historical moment: "the present volume should perhaps, even in fairness, be read as a document explicatory of the 'nineties, rather than as a current interpretation" (Eliot 1928: 92). Eliot assumed the modernist view that translation is a fundamental domestication resulting in an autonomous text: "the work of translation is to make something foreign, or something remote in time, live with our own life" (ibid.: 98). But the only "life" Eliot would allow in translation conformed to his peculiar brand of modernism. What made Symons's version "wrong," "a mistranslation," "a smudgy botch" was precisely that he "enveloped Baudelaire in the Swinburnian violet-coloured London fog of the 'nineties," turning the French poet into "a contemporary of Dowson and Wilde" (ibid.: 91, 99–100, 102, 103). The "right" version was shaped by what Eliot announced as his "general point of view," "classicist in literature, royalist in politics, and anglo-catholic in religion" (ibid.: vii). Thus "the important fact about Baudelaire is that he was essentially a Christian, born out of his due time, and a classicist, born out of his due time" (ibid.: 103), where the "time" that matters is Eliot's present: "Dowson and Wilde have passed, and Baudelaire remains; he belonged to a generation that preceded them, and yet he is much more our contemporary than they" (ibid.: 91).

Pound too privileged foreign texts that he could mobilize in a modernist cultural politics, but his ideological standpoint was different from Eliot's and more than a little inconsistent. Certain medieval poetries, notably the Provençal troubadour lyric and the dolce stil nuovo, were to be recovered through interpretation, translation, and imitation because they contained values that had been lost in Western culture, but that would now be restored by modernism. Guido Cavalcanti's poetry was assimilated to modernist philosophical and poetic values like positivism and linguistic precision. In Pound's essay "Cavalcanti" (1928), "the difference between Guido's precise interpretive metaphor, and the Petrarchan fustian and ornament" is that Guido's "phrases correspond to definite sensations undergone" (Anderson 1983: 214). This essay also made clear the peculiarly political nature of Pound's cultural restoration, couching his modernist reading of Cavalcanti's poetry in a rabid anti-clericalism and racism:

We have lost the radiant world where one thought cuts through another with clean edge, a world of moving energies "mezzo oscuro rade," "risplende in sé perpetuale effecto," magnetisms that take form, that are seen, or that border the visible, the matter of Dante's Paradiso, the glass under water, the form that seems a form seen in a mirror, these realities perceptible to the sense, interacting, "a lui si tiri" untouched by the two maladies, the Hebrew disease, the Hindoo disease, fanaticisms and excess that produce Savonarola, asceticisms that produce fakirs, St. Clement of Alexandria, with his prohibition of bathing by women.

(Anderson 1983: 208)

Elsewhere in the same essay Pound shifted this ideological standpoint by linking his interest in medieval poetry to an anti-commercialism with radical democratic leanings. Cavalcanti's philosophical canzone, "Donna mi prega," shows traces of a tone of thought no longer considered dangerous, but that may have appeared about as soothing to the Florentine of A.D. 1290 as conversation about Tom Paine, Marx, Lenin and Bucharin would to-day in a Methodist bankers' board meeting in Memphis, Tenn.

(Ibid.: 203)

Pound, like Bunting and Eliot, concealed his modernist appropriation of foreign texts behind a claim of aesthetic autonomy for translation. He concluded his 1929 essay "Guido's Relations" by distinguishing between an "interpretative translation," prepared as an "accompaniment" to the foreign text, and "the other sort" of translation, which possesses an aesthetic independence: it "falls simply in the domain of original writing, or if it does not it must be censured according to equal standards" (Anderson 1983: 251). Pound drew this distinction when he published his own translations. The 1920 collection Umbra: The Early Poems of Ezra Pound ended with a "Main outline of E.P.'s works to date," in which he classified "The Seafarer," "Exile's Letter (and Cathay in general)," and "Homage to Sextus Propertius" as "Major Personae," whereas his versions of Cavalcanti and Provençal poets like Arnaut Daniel were labelled "Etudes," study guides to the foreign texts (ibid.: xviii–xix). Pound saw them all as his "poems," but used the term "Major Personae" to single out translations that deserved to be judged according to the same standards as his "original writing." The appeal to these (unnamed) standards means of course that Pound's translations put foreign texts in the service of a modernist poetics, evident, for example, in his use of free verse and precise language, but also in the selection of foreign texts where a "persona" could be constructed, an independent voice or mask for the poet. Here it is possible to see that the values Pound's autonomous translations inscribed in foreign texts included not only a modernist poetics, but an individualism that was at once romantic and patriarchal. He characterized the translation that is an original composition in the individualistic terms of romantic expressive theory ("the expression of the translator"). And what received expression in translations like "The Seafarer" and "The River Merchant's Wife: A Letter" was the psychology of an aggressive male or a submissive female in a male-dominated world.

Yet Pound's translation theory and practice were various enough to qualify and redirect his modernist appropriation of foreign texts, often in contradictory ways. His concept of "interpretative translation," or "translation of accompaniment," shows that for him the ideal of aesthetic autonomy coincided with a kind of translation that made explicit its dependence on cultural values in the receiving situation, not merely to make a literary difference in the translating language, but to signal the differences of the foreign text. In the introduction to his translation, Sonnets and Ballate of Guido Cavalcanti (1912), Pound admitted that "in the matter of these translations and of my knowledge of Tuscan poetry, Rossetti is my father and my mother, but no one man can see everything at once” (Anderson 1983: 14). Pound saw Dante Gabriel Rossetti’s versions as the resource for an archaic lexicon, which he developed to signify the different language and cultural context of Cavalcanti’s poetry:

It is conceivable the poetry of a far-off time or place requires a translation not only of word and of spirit, but of “accompaniment,” that is, that the modern audience must in some measure be made aware of the mental content of the older audience, and of what these others drew from certain fashions of thought and speech. Six centuries of derivative convention and loose usage have obscured the exact significance of such phrases as: “The death of the heart,” and “The departure of the soul.”

(Ibid.: 12)

The translation of accompaniment required bilingual publication. It signified the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text by deviating from current English usage and thereby sending the reader across the page to confront the foreign language. “As to the atrocities of my translation,” Pound wrote in “Cavalcanti,” “all that can be said in excuse is that they are, I hope, for the most part intentional, and committed with the aim of driving the reader’s perception further into the original than it would without them have penetrated” (Anderson 1983: 221). In a 1927 “Postscript” to his variorum edition of Cavalcanti’s poems, Pound criticized his archaizing strategy, but felt it needed further refinement, not abandonment, in order to suggest the generic distinctions in the Italian texts: “the translator might, with profit, have accentuated the differences and used for the occasional pieces a lighter, a more Browningsque, and less heavy Swinburnian language” (ibid.: 5). A couple of years later, in “Guido’s Relations,” Pound crankily condemned his earlier use of archaism, arguing that he “was obfuscated by the Victorian language,” “the crust of dead English, the sediment present in my own available vocabulary” (ibid.: 243). But once again he didn’t decide to abandon it. On the contrary, his idea was that the discourses in an English-language poetry translation should be as heterogeneous as possible: “one can only learn a series of Englishes,” he insisted, and so “it is stupid to overlook the lingual inventions of precurrent authors, even when they were fools or flapdoodles or Tennysons” (ibid.: 244). When, in this 1929 essay, Pound offered his own translation of Cavalcanti as an example, he described his discourse as “pre-Elizabethan English” (ibid.: 250).

Pound’s interpretative translations display this increasing heterogeneity, particularly since he revised them repeatedly over the course of several decades. His debt to Rossetti was announced early, in The Spirit of Romance (1910), where he quoted often and admiringly from the Victorian poet’s versions of the dolce stilnovisti. When Pound wrote his own first versions of Cavalcanti’s poems, they sometimes echoed Rossetti’s.

Here is Cavalcanti's evocation of the angelic lady:

Chi è questa che vien, ch'ogni uom la mira,
 Che fa di clarità l'aer tremare!
 E mena seco Amor, sì che parlare
 Null'uom ne puote, ma ciascun sospira?
 Ahi Dio, che sembra quando gli occhi gira!
 Dicalo Amor, ch'io not saprei contare;
 Cotanto d'umiltà donna mi pare,
 Che ciascun'altra in vèr di lei chiam'ira.
 Non si potria contar la sua piacenza,
 Ch'a lei s'inchina ogni gentil virtute,
 E la beltate per sue Dea la mostra.
 Non fu sì alta già la mente nostra,
 E non si è posta in noi tanta salute,
 Che propriamente n'abbiam conoscenza.

(Anderson 1983: 42)

This was translated fluently by Rossetti, who resorted to a relatively unobtrusive archaism in verse form (an Italianate sonnet) and in diction (“thereon,” “benison,” “ne'er”) – relatively unobtrusive, that is, in the context of Victorian poetry:

Who is she coming, whom all gaze upon,
 Who makes the air all tremulous with light,
 And at whose side is Love himself? that none
 Dare speak, but each man's sighs are infinite.
 Let Love discourse: I may not speak thereon.
 Lady she seems of such high benison
 As makes all others graceless in men's sight.
 The honour which is hers cannot be said;
 To whom are subject all things virtuous,
 While all things beauteous own her deity.
 Ne'er was the mind of man so nobly led,
 Nor yet was such redemption granted us
 That we should ever know her perfectly.

(Rossetti 1981: 223)

Some of Rossetti's deviations from the Italian improve the fluency of the translation by simplifying the syntax. “At whose side is Love himself,” for instance, is a free rendering of “mena seco Amor” that reads much more easily than a closer version like “she leads Love with herself.” Rossetti also added different nuances to Cavalcanti's idealization of the lady, making it more moral or spiritual, even theological, by using “benison” for “umiltà” (“humility,” “meekness,” “modesty”), “honour” for “piacenza” (“pleasantness”), and “redemption” for “salute” (“health,” “salvation”).

Pound’s 1910 version quoted Rossetti’s, but it adhered more closely to the Italian text and noticeably increased the archaism. Next to Rossetti’s version, moreover, Pound’s offered a more human image of the lady by referring to her “modesty” and “charm” and suggesting that she commands the attention of an aristocratic elite (“noble powers”). The lover meanwhile possesses a knightly “daring” that “ne’er before did look so high,” spiritually or socially:

Who is she coming, whom all gaze upon,
 Who makes the whole air tremulous with light,
 And leadeth with her Love, so no man hath Power of speech, but each one sigheth?
 Ah God! the thing she’s like when her eyes turn,
 Let Amor tell! ‘Tis past my utterance:
 And so she seems mistress of modesty
 That every other woman is named “Wrath.”
 Her charm could never be a thing to tell
 For all the noble powers lean toward her.
 Beauty displays her for an holy sign.
 Our daring ne’er before did look so high;
 But ye! there is not in you so much grace
 That we can understand her rightfully.

(Anderson 1983: 43)

The version Pound published in his 1912 collection, Sonnets and Ballate, constituted a substantial revision, but it did not alter his basic archaizing strategy:

Who is she coming, drawing all men’s gaze,
 Who makes the air one trembling clarity
 Till none can speak but each sighs piteously
 Where she leads Love adown her trodden ways?
 Ah God! The thing she’s like when her glance strays, Let Amor tell. ’Tis no fit speech for me.
 Mistress she seems of such great modesty
 That every other woman were called “Wrath.”
 No one could ever tell the charm she hath
 For all the noble powers bend toward her,
 She being beauty’s godhead manifest.
 Our daring ne’er before held such high quest;
 But ye! There is not in you so much grace
 That we can understand her rightfully.

(Ibid.: 45)

Pound retained some of his borrowings from Rossetti and used additional archaic forms (“adown,” “godhead,” “quest”) that introduced a romantic medievalism traced with misogyny. The opening characterized the lady as a Keatsian “belle dame sans merci,” implying that she exploits her commanding beauty (“drawing all men’s gaze”) to victimize her many admirers (“each sighs piteously”) with some frequency (“adown her trodden ways”). There was even a hint of moral imperfection, a potential for infidelity (“her glance strays”).

In 1932, Pound published Guido Cavalcanti Rime, a critical edition of the Italian texts along with several translations that included a final version of this sonnet. Here the archaism was pushed to an extreme, apparent not just in Pound’s lexicon, syntax, and orthography, but also in pseudo-archaic neologism (“herward”). The lady underwent yet another metamorphosis, this time into a mystical image “that borders the visible”:

Who is she that comes, makyng turn every man’s eye
 And makyng the air to tremble with a bright clearnesse
 That leadeth with her Love, in such nearness
 No man may proffer of speech more than a sigh?

Ah God, what she is like when her owne eye turneth, is Fit for Amor to speake, for I can not at all;
 Such is her modesty, I would call
 Every woman else but an useless uneasiness.

No one could ever tell all of her pleasauntness
 In that every high noble vertu leaneth to herward,
 So Beauty sheweth her forth as her Godhede;

Never before was our mind so high led,
 Nor have we so much of heal as will afford
 That our thought may take her immediate in its embrace.

(Anderson 1983: 46)

The lady is portrayed as perceptible to the senses but unattainable in her spirituality, a neo-Platonic Idea that exceeds even the quasi-physical “embrace” of human “thought.” This representation certainly pinpoints a central theme in the dolce stil nuovo, but it is also recognizable as Pound’s modernist reading of the medieval poetries he celebrated: “The conception of the body as perfected instrument of the increasing intelligence pervades” (ibid.: 206); “the central theme of the troubadours, is the dogma that there is some proportion between the fine thing held in the mind, and the inferior thing ready for instant consumption” (ibid.: 205). Just as in “Philip Massinger” (1920) Eliot posited a unified “sensibility” in English literary culture before the late seventeenth century, “a period when the intellect was immediately at the tips of the senses” (Eliot 1950: 185), Pound discovered a “harmony of the sentient” in Cavalcanti, “where the thought has its demarcation, the substance its virtù, where stupid men have not reduced all ‘energy’ to unbounded undistinguished abstraction” (Anderson 1983: 209).

On the thematic level, Pound’s translations inscribed Cavalcanti’s texts with values that differed from Rossetti’s in being both modernist and patriarchal, notably in the representation of the lady, transformed by his revisions from “the inferior thing ready for instant consumption” into “the fine thing held in the mind.” But Pound’s successive versions were also interrogative in their relation to the Italian texts and to Rossetti’s translations, showing how the female idealization of the dolce stilnovisti and the Pre-Raphaelites assumed a female degradation, a misogynist suspicion that the lady’s value is “inferior,” dependent on the male imagination. In fashioning himself as a poet-translator, Pound was competing against two poetic “fathers,” Cavalcanti and Rossetti, and this oedipal competition took the form of revising the image of the lady.

On the level of discourse, however, Pound’s translations don’t easily support the positivist concept of language in his modernist readings. The dense archaism hardly produces the illusionistic effect of transparency that he valued in the dolce stilnovisti, what he described so rapturously as the virtual invisibility of literary form, “the glass under water” (Anderson 1983: 208). The peculiarities of Pound’s archaic text preempt any illusionism by calling attention to the language as a specific kind of English, a poetic discourse linked to a specific historical moment that is neither Pound’s nor Cavalcanti’s nor Rossetti’s. The final version of the sonnet, “Who is she that comes,” was the text Pound quoted in “Guido’s Relations” to illustrate how “pre-Elizabethan English” can be used to translate Cavalcanti. Pound’s rationale for this discourse was distinctively modernist: he described the pre-Elizabethan as “a period when the writers were still intent on clarity and explicitness, still preferring them to magniloquence and the thundering phrase,” echoing Eliot’s criticisms of Marlowe and Milton (ibid.: 250). But Pound also knew that his archaizing strategy resulted less in clarity and explicitness than in a sense of oddity or unfamiliarity:

The objections to such a method are: the doubt as to whether one has the right to take a serious poem and turn it into a mere exercise in quaintness; the “misrepresentation” not of the poem’s antiquity, but of the proportionate feel of that antiquity, by which I mean that Guido’s thirteenth-century language is to twentieth-century Italian sense much less archaic than any fourteenth-, fifteenth-, or early sixteenth-century English is for us.

(Ibid.: 250)

The archaism did not achieve any greater fidelity to the Italian texts, nor did it establish an analogy between two past cultures, one Italian, the other English. Despite Pound’s modernist pronouncements, the archaism could not overcome “six centuries of derivative convention and loose usage” to communicate “the exact significances of such phrases as ‘The death of the heart,’ and ‘The departure of the soul’” because it pointed to a different literary culture in a different language at a different historical moment. Pound's pre-Elizabethan English could do no more than signify the remoteness of Cavalcanti's poetry, along with the impossibility of finding any exact linguistic and literary equivalent. And the archaism did this only because it radically departed from cultural norms that currently prevailed in English. This is perhaps most noticeable in Pound's archaic prosody: as David Anderson has observed, he wanted "to free the cadence of his English versions from the Elizabethan and post-Elizabethan iambic pentameter," still the standard for English-language verse at the beginning of the twentieth century (Anderson 1982: 13; Easthope 1983).

Pound's comments on his versions of Arnaut Daniel revealed his acute awareness that current cultural norms constrained his work as a translator. These were his most experimental translations, texts where he developed the most heterogeneous discourses. Like the later Cavalcanti translations, they mixed various archaic forms, mainly "Pre-Raphaelite mediaevalism" (Pound's notation for "Rossetti: Italian poets" in ABC of Reading [Pound 1960: 133]) and pre-Elizabethan English, culled mainly from Gavin Douglas's 1531 version of the Aeneid, but also from such early Tudor poets as Sir Thomas Wyatt (McDougal 1972: 114; Anderson 1982: 13). And there were occasional traces of twentieth-century American colloquialism and foreign languages, particularly French and Provençal. The following exemplary passages are excerpts from the translations Pound published in his essay, "Arnaut Daniel" (1920):

When I see leaf, and flower and fruit
 Come forth upon light lynd and bough,
 And hear the frogs in rillet bruit,
 And birds quhitter in forest now,
 Love inkirlie doth leaf and flower and bear,
 And trick my night from me, and stealing waste it,
 Whilst other wight in rest and sleep sojourneth.
 (Pound 1953: 177)

So clear the flare
 That first lit me
 To seize
 Her whom my soul believes;
 If cad
 Sneaks,
 Blabs, slanders, my joy
 Counts little fee
 Baits
 And their hates.
 I scorn their perk
 And preen, at ease.
 Disburse

Can she, and wake
Such firm delights, that I Am hers, froth, lees
Bigod! from toe to earring.
(Ibid.: 161, 163)

Flimsy another's joy, false and distort,
No paregale that she springs not above. [...]
Her love-touch by none other mensurate.
To have it not? Alas! Though the pains bite Deep, torture is but galzeardy and dance,
For in my thought my lust hath touched his aim.
God! Shall I get no more! No fact to best it!
(Ibid.: 179, 181)

Pound saw these as interpretative translations that highlighted the elaborate stanzaic forms of the Provençal texts, mimicking their rhythms and sound effects. But he also knew that by doing so his translations ran counter to literary values that prevailed in modern European languages like English and French. In the essay on Daniel, he apologized for his deviations:

in extenuation of the language of my verses, I would point out that the Provençals were not constrained by the modern literary sense. Their restraints were the tune and rhyme-scheme, they were not constrained by a need for certain qualities of writing, without which no modern poem is complete or satisfactory. They were not competing with De Maupassant's prose.
(Pound 1954: 115)

The mention of De Maupassant indicates that Pound's translations could signify the difference of Daniel's musical prosody only by challenging the transparent discourse that dominates "the modern literary sense," most conspicuously in realistic fiction. To mimic an archaic verse form, Pound developed a discursive heterogeneity that refused a narrowly conceived fluency, privileging the signifier over the signified, risking not just the unidiomatic, but the unintelligible. In a 1922 letter to Felix Schelling, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania who taught English literature to Pound and unfavorably reviewed his Daniel translations, Pound cited the cultural remoteness of troubadour poetry as "the reason for the archaic dialect": "the Provençal feeling is archaic, we are ages away from it" (Pound 1950: 179). And Pound measured this remoteness on a scale of current English-language values: "The troubadour, fortunately perhaps, was not worried about English [word] order; he got certain musical effects because he cd. concentrate on music without bothering about literary values. He had a kind of freedom which we no longer have" (ibid.). Pound's translations signified the foreignness of the foreign text, not because they were faithful or accurate – he admitted that “if I have succeeded in indicating some of the properties [...] I have also let [others] go by the board” (Pound 1954: 116) – but because they deviated from literary canons in English.

Pound’s first versions of Cavalcanti’s poetry did in fact look alien to his contemporaries. In a review of the Sonnets and Ballate that appeared in the English Poetry Review (1912), professor of Italian Arundel del Re found the translation defective and not entirely comprehensible, including the bilingual title: “The translation of the ‘Sonnets and Ballate’ – why not Sonetti e Ballate or Sonnets and Ballads? – shows the author to be earnestly striving after a vital idea of which one sometimes catches a glimpse amidst the general tangle and disorder” (Homberger 1972: 88). Yet Del Re recognized the historicizing effect of Pound’s archaism, quoting phrases from Pound’s own introduction to describe it: “Notwithstanding its almost overpowering defects this is a sincere if slipshod attempt to translate into English the ‘accompaniment’ and ‘the mental content of what the contemporaries of Guido Cavalcanti drew forth from certain forms of thought and speech’” (ibid.). In John Bailey’s review for the Times Literary Supplement, the “strangeness” of Pound’s translation also began with the choice of foreign text: he felt that “though not belonging to the high universal order,” Cavalcanti’s poetry does possess the “peculiar charm” of “an escape from all that is contemporary or even actual into [the] hortus conclusus of art” (Homberger 1972: 88). But what Bailey found unpleasantly strange about Pound’s translation was that, compared to Rossetti’s, it was utterly lacking in fluency:

He is sometimes clumsy, and often obscure, and has no fine tact about language, using such words and phrases as “Ballatet,” “ridded,” “to whomso runs,” and others of dubious or unhappy formation. A more serious fault still is that he frequently absolves himself altogether from the duty of rhyming, and if an English blank verse sonnet were ever an endurable thing it would not be when it pretends to represent an Italian original.

(Ibid.: 91)

Bailey praised Rossetti because he “preserves” a great deal “more of the original rhyme and movement” (ibid.: 92). What constituted fluent translation for Bailey was not just univocal meaning, recognizable archaism, and prosodic smoothness, but a Victorian poetic discourse, Pre-Raphaelite medievalism, only one among other archaic forms in Pound’s translations. The fact that Pound was violating a hegemonic cultural norm is clear at the beginning of Bailey’s review, where he allied himself with Matthew Arnold and claimed to speak for “any rich and public-spirited statesman of intellectual tastes to-day” (ibid.: 89).

Other commentators were more appreciative of Pound’s work as a translator, but their evaluations differed according to which of his changing rationales they accepted. In a 1920 article for the North American Review, May Sinclair, the English novelist who was a friend of Pound’s, offered a favorable assessment of his publications to date. Following Pound’s sense of the cultural remoteness of

Provençal poetry, Sinclair argued that the archaism in his translations signalled the absence of any true equivalence in modern English:

By every possible device – the use of strange words like “gentrice” and “plasmatur” – he throws [Provençal poetry] seven centuries back in time. It is to sound as different from modern speech as he can make it, because it belongs to a world that by the very nature of its conventions is inconceivably remote, inconceivably different from our own, a world that we can no longer reconstruct in its reality.

(Hombberger 1972: 183)

In a 1932 review of Guido Cavalcanti Rime for Hound and Horn, A. Hyatt Mayor followed Pound’s modernist reading of the Italian texts, his positivist sense of their precise language, and therefore didn’t see the strangeness of the archaism, praising the translations instead for establishing a true equivalence to the “freshness” of the Italian:

The quaint language is not a pastiche of pre-Shakespearean sonnets, or an attempt to make Cavalcanti talk Elizabethan the way Andrew Lang made Homer try to talk King James. Ezra Pound is matching Cavalcanti’s early freshness with a color lifted from the early freshness of English poetry.

(Mayor 1932: 471)

Sinclair saw that Pound’s translations were interpretative in their use of archaism, meant to indicate the historical distance of the foreign text, whereas Mayor took the translations as independent literary works that could be judged against others in the present or past, and whose value, therefore, was timeless. “The English seems to me as fine as the Italian,” he wrote, “In fact, the line Who were like nothing save her shadow cast is more beautifully definite than Ma simigliavan sol la sua ombria” (ibid.: 470).

Pound’s theory and practice of interpretative translation reverse the priorities set by modernist commentators on translation like Mayor, Bunting, Eliot, and Pound himself. Interpretative translation contradicts the ideal of autonomy by pointing to the various conditions of the translated text, those specific to the foreign as well as the receiving culture, and thus makes clear that translation can make a difference in the translating language only by trying to signify the differences of the foreign text. The discursive heterogeneity of Pound’s interpretative translations, especially his use of archaism, was both an innovation of modernist poetics and a deviation from current linguistic and literary values, sufficiently noticeable to seem alien. Pound shows that in translation the foreignness of the foreign text is available only in cultural forms that already circulate in the translating language, some with greater cultural capital than others. In translation the foreignness of the foreign text can only be what currently appears “foreign” in the receiving culture, in relation to dominant values, and therefore only as values that are marginal in various degrees, whether because they are residual, survivals of previous linguistic and cultural forms, or because they are emergent, transformations of previous forms that are recognizably different, or because they are specialized or nonstandard, forms linked to specific groups with varying degrees of social power and prestige. The foreign can only be a disruption of the current hierarchy of values in the receiving culture, an estrangement of them that seeks to establish a cultural difference by drawing on the marginal. Translation, then, always involves a process of domestication, an exchange of foreign-language intelligibilities for those of the translating language. But domestication need not mean assimilation, that is, a conservative reduction of the foreign text to dominant values. It can also mean resistance, through a recovery of the residual or an affiliation with the emergent or the dominated – choosing to translate a foreign text, for instance, that is excluded by prevalent English-language translation practices or by the current canon of foreign literature in English and thus forcing a methodological revision and a canon reformation.

The remarkable thing about modernist translation is that, even though in theoretical statements it insists on the aesthetic autonomy of the translated text, it still led to the development of translation practices that drew on a broad range of discourses in the translating language and repeatedly recovered the excluded and the marginal to challenge the dominant. Pound's translations avoided the transparent discourse that has dominated English-language translation since the seventeenth century. Instead of translating to produce a narrowly defined variety of fluency, foregrounding the signified and minimizing any play of the signifier that impeded communication, pursuing linear syntax, univocal meaning, current usage, standard dialects, prosodic smoothness, Pound increased the play of the signifier, cultivating inverted or convoluted syntax, polysemy, archaism, nonstandard dialects, elaborate stanzaic forms and sound effects – textual features that frustrate immediate intelligibility, empathic response, interpretive mastery. And by doing this Pound addressed the problem of domestication that nags not just his own claim of aesthetic autonomy, but also the transparent discourse dominating English-language translation. Transparency inscribes the foreign text with dominant English values (like transparency) and simultaneously conceals that domestication under the illusion that the translated text is not a translation, but the “original,” reflecting the foreign author's personality or intention or the essential meaning of the foreign text; whereas modernist translation, by deviating from transparency and inscribing the foreign text with marginal English values, initiates a foreignizing movement that points to the linguistic and cultural differences between the two texts (admitting, of course, that some of the values inscribed by modernists like Pound are neither marginal nor especially democratic – e.g. patriarchy).

This is not a concept of translation that modernism theorized with any consistency, but rather one that its translation theories and practices make possible. It won't be found in a modernist critic of modernism like Bunting, Eliot, or Hugh Kenner, because such critics accept the claim of aesthetic autonomy for the translated text. “Ezra Pound never translates ‘into’ something already existing in English,” wrote Kenner, “only Pound has had both the boldness and resource to make a new form, similar in effect to that of the original” (Pound 1953: 9). Yet what can now be seen is that a translation is unable to produce an effect equivalent to that of the foreign text because translation is domestication, the inscription of cultural values that differ fundamentally from those in the foreign language. Pound’s effects were aimed only at Anglophone cultures, and so he always translated into preexisting English cultural forms – Anglo-Saxon patterns of accent and alliteration, pre-Elizabethan English, Pre-Raphaelite medievalism, modernist precision, American colloquialism. In fact, Pound’s reliance on preexisting forms erases his distinction between two kinds of translation: both interpretative translations and translations that are new poems resort to the innovations of modernist poetics, and so both can be said to offer “a photograph, as exact as possible, of one side of the statue” (Anderson 1983: 5) – the side selected and framed by Anglophone modernism. The discursive heterogeneity Pound created may have made the translated texts look “new” – to modernists – but it was also a technique that signalled their difference, both from dominant English values and from those that shaped the foreign text. Modernism enables a postmodernist concept of translation that assumes the impossibility of any autonomous aesthetic value and views the foreign as at once irredeemably mediated and strategically useful, a culturally variable category that needs to be constructed to guide the translator’s intervention into the current situation in the receiving culture.

2 The reaction against modernism

By the start of the 1950s modernist translation had achieved widespread acceptance in British and American literary culture – but only in part, notably the claim of aesthetic autonomy for the translated text and formal choices that were now familiar enough to insure a domestication of the foreign text, that is, free verse and precise current language. The most decisive innovations of modernism inspired few translators, no doubt because the translations, essays, and reviews that contained these innovations were difficult to locate, available only in obscure periodicals and rare limited editions, but also because they ran counter to the fluent strategies that continued to dominate English-language poetry translation. The first sign of this marginalization was the reception given to the selected edition of Pound’s translations published by the American trade press New Directions in 1953. This book offered a substantial retrospective, reprinting his latest versions of Cavalcanti and Daniel in bilingual format, as well as “The Seafarer,” Cathay, Noh plays, a prose text by Rémy de Gourmont, and a miscellany of poetry translations from Latin, Provençal, French, and Italian.

At the time of this publication Pound was an extremely controversial figure (Stock 1982: 423–4, 426–7; Homberger 1972: 24–7). His wartime radio broadcasts under Mussolini’s government got him tried for treason in the United States and ultimately committed to St Elizabeth's Hospital for the Criminally Insane in Washington, DC (1946). But he was also recognized as a leading contemporary poet with the award of the Bollingen Prize for The Pisan Cantos (1948), an event that prompted fierce attacks and debates in The New York Times, Partisan Review, and the Saturday Review of Literature, among other newspapers and magazines. In this cultural climate it was inevitable not just that the translations would be widely reviewed, but that they would provoke a range of conflicting responses. Some recognized the innovative nature of Pound's work, even if they were unsure of its value; others dismissed it as a failed experiment that was now dated, void of cultural power.

The favorable judgments came, once again, from reviewers who shared a modernist cultural agenda. In England Poetry Review praised the "clever versification" of the Daniel versions, while treating their discursive heterogeneity with the sort of elitism Pound sometimes voiced in his own celebrations of earlier poetries: "It is said that Arnaut was deliberately obscure, so that his songs should not be understood by the vulgar. Rather modern" (Graham 1953: 472).¹ In the United States John Edwards's review for Poetry shared the basic assumption of his Berkeley doctoral dissertation on Pound – namely, that this was a canonical American writer – and so the review complained at length that the translations deserved much better editorial treatment than New Directions gave them (Edwards 1954: 238). Edwards's sympathy for modernism was apparent in his unacknowledged quotation from Kenner's introduction to the translations (said to represent "an extension of the possibilities of poetic speech in our language" [ibid.: 238]), but also in a remarkable description of the Cavalcanti versions that was blind to their dense archaism:

One need only read Cavalcanti's Sonnet XVI in the Rossetti version (Early Italian Poets), then in the first Pound attempt (Sonnets and Ballate of Guido Cavalcanti, 1912), and finally in the 1931 Pound translation given here, and one can watch the crust falling off and the line grow clean and firm, bringing the original over into English, not only the words but the poetry.

(Ibid.: 238)

Edwards accepted Pound's modernist rationale for his translations: that Cavalcanti's Italian texts were distinguished by linguistic precision, and that pre-Elizabethan English possessed sufficient "clarity and explicitness" to translate them. But Edwards lacked Pound's contrary awareness that this strategy made the translations less "clean and firm" than odd or unfamiliar, likely to be taken as "a mere exercise in quaintness."

There were also reviewers who were more astute in understanding the modernist agenda of the translations, but who were nonetheless skeptical of its cultural value. In a review for the New Statesman and Nation the English poet and critic Donald Davie, who has attacked the project of Pound's poetry even while reinforcing its canonical status in academic literary criticism,² saw that the interpretative translations came with a peculiarly dogmatic claim of aesthetic autonomy, most evident in their archaism:

when he translates Cavalcanti, he aspires to give an absolute translation not, of course, in the sense that it is to reproduce in English all the effects of the original, but in the sense that it is to be Cavalcanti in English for good and all, not just for this generation or the next few. Hence the archaic diction, sometimes with olde-Englysshe spelling. [...] Pound believes that English came nearest to accommodating the sort of effects Cavalcanti gets in Italian, in one specific period, late-Chaucerian or early Tudor.

But Pound never assumed an “absolute” equivalence between period styles. In fact, in “Guido’s Relations,” he pointed to the impossibility of finding an exact English-language equivalent: at least one quality of the Italian texts “simply does not occur in English poetry,” so “there is no ready-made verbal pigment for its objectification”; using pre-Elizabethan English actually involved “the ‘misrepresentation’ not of the poem’s antiquity, but of the proportionate feel of that antiquity” for Italian readers (Anderson 1983: 250). What seemed too absolute for Davie was really Pound’s rationale for using archaism: he didn’t like the translations because he didn’t accept the modernist readings of the foreign texts (“I still ask out of my ignorance if Cavalcanti is worth all the claims Pound has made for him, and all the time he has given him” [Davie 1953: 264]). Yet Davie did accept the modernist ideal of aesthetic independence, erasing the distinction between interpretative translation and new poem by evaluating all Pound’s translations as literary texts in their own right – and finding the most experimental ones mediocre performances. The Cavalcanti versions “give the impression of not a Wyatt but a Surrey, the graceful virtuoso of a painfully limited and ultimately trivial convention” (ibid.).

George Whicher of Amherst College reviewed Pound’s translations twice, and on both occasions the judgments were unfavorable, resting on an informed but critical appreciation of modernist poetics. In the academic journal American Literature Whicher felt that the “evidence contained in this book” did not support Kenner’s claim of aesthetic autonomy: “far from making a new form, Pound was merely producing a clever approximation to an old one” (Whicher 1954: 120). In the end, Pound’s work as a translator indicated his marginality in the American literary canon, “somewhat apart from the tradition of the truly creative American poets like Whitman, Melville, and Emily Dickinson” (ibid.: 121). Whicher measured Pound’s translations against his call for linguistic precision and faulted their “pedantic diction”: “he had not yet freed himself from the affectation of archaism which marks and mars his ‘Ballad of the Goodly Frere’” (ibid.: 120).³ In the New York Herald Tribune Whicher joined Davie in questioning Pound’s choice of foreign texts, using the translations as an opportunity to treat modernism as passé, perhaps once seen as “revolutionary,” but rather “dull” in 1953:

It is almost impossible to realize [...] how revolutionary was the publication of “Cavalcanti Poems” in the year 1912. Here was a first conscious blow in the campaign to deflate poetry to its bare essentials. [...] Now, however, we wonder how so excellent a craftsman as Pound could have labored through so many dull poems, even with the help of a minor Italian.

(Whicher 1953: 25)

The negative reviews of these and other critics (Leslie Fiedler’s, in a glance at Pound’s hospital confinement, called his Daniel versions “Dante Gabriel Rossetti gone off his rocker!” [Fiedler 1962: 120]) signalled a midcentury reaction against modernism that banished Pound’s translations to the fringes of British and American literary cultures (Perkins 1987; von Hallberg, 1985). The center in Anglophone poetry translation was held by fluent strategies that were modern, but not entirely modernist – domesticating in their assimilation of foreign texts to the transparent discourse that prevailed in every form of contemporary print culture; consistent in their refusal of the discursive heterogeneity by which modernist translation sought to signify linguistic and cultural differences. The review of Pound’s translations written by the influential Dudley Fitts exemplified this cultural situation in the sharpest terms.

Fitts (1903–68) was a poet and critic who from the late 1930s onward gained a distinguished reputation as a translator of classical texts, for the most part drama by Sophocles and Aristophanes. He translated Greek and Latin epigrams as well and edited a noted anthology of twentieth-century Latin American poetry. As translator and editor of translations, he produced sixteen books, mainly with the large commercial press Harcourt Brace. His reviews of poetry and translations were widely published in various magazines, mass and small circulation, including some linked with modernism: Atlantic Monthly, The Criterion, Hound and Horn, Poetry, Transition. The entry on Fitts in Contemporary Authors concisely indicates the cultural authority he wielded during the 1950s and 1960s, while offering a glimpse of the canonical translation strategy his work represented:

Dudley Fitts was one of the foremost translators from the ancient Greek in this century. Differing from the procedure many scholars follow, Fitts attempted to evoke the inherent character from the work by taking certain liberties with the text. The result, most reviewers agreed, was a version as pertinent and meaningful to the modern reader as it was to the audiences of Sophocles and Aristophanes.

(Locher 1980: 152)

The “inherent character” of “the work,” “as pertinent and meaningful to the modern reader as” to the Greek “audiences” – the entry makes the uncritical assumption that appeals to the foreign text can insure a true equivalence in the translation, transcending cultural and historical differences and even the linguistic “liberties” taken by the translator. This anonymous, somewhat contradictory entry makes clear that Fitts's authority as a translator rested on his advocacy of a free, domesticating practice that rewrote the foreign text in recognizable terms, like "modern" English.

In the preface to his One Hundred Poems from the Palatine Anthology (1938) Fitts described his approach in some detail:

I have not really undertaken translation at all – translation, that is to say, as it is understood in the schools. I have simply tried to restate in my own idiom what the Greek verses have meant to me. The disadvantages of this method are obvious: it has involved cutting, altering, expansion, revision – in short, all the devices of free paraphrase. [...] In general, my purpose has been to compose, first of all, and as simply as possible, an English poem. To this end I have discarded poeticisms, even where (as in Meleagros, for instance) they could have been defended. Except in certain Dedications and in similar pieces where the language is definitely liturgical, I have avoided such archaisms as "thou" and "ye" and all their train of attendant ghosts. Less defensibly, I have risked a spurious atmosphere of monotheism by writing "God" for "Zeus" (but Mr. Leslie would have it "Jupiter"!) whenever the context admitted it without too perilous a clash.

(Fitts 1956: xvii–xviii)

The first thing worth remarking is how much Fitts's practice was indebted to modernist translation, especially Pound's work. The assertion of the aesthetic independence of the translation, the decision to submit the foreign text to "revision," the reliance on contemporary English, even the swipe at academic translations, presumably too literal and therefore not literary – all this characterized Pound's translation theory and practice (but also earlier figures in the history of English-language translation: some of Pound's views, like Bunting's, date back to Denham and Dryden). Fitts knew and reviewed Pound's work, corresponded with him during the 1930s, and, at the Choate School, taught Pound's poetry to James Laughlin, who launched New Directions and published Fitts's Palatine Anthology as well as many of Pound's books (Stock 1982: 322–3; Carpenter 1988: 527–8). Fitts's most significant departure from Pound in this volume, a departure that was now determining Pound's reception both in and out of the academy, was the refusal of different poetic discourses, including archaism. Preexisting cultural materials fade into "ghosts" with the claim of aesthetic autonomy for the translation, which can then carry out a thoroughgoing domestication that inscribes the foreign text with translating-language values, both linguistic (fluency) and cultural (a Judeo-Christian monotheism – "writing 'God' for 'Zeus'").

When Fitts reprinted this translation in 1956, he added a "Note" that apologized for not revising the texts: "My theories of translation have changed so radically that any attempt to recast the work of fifteen or twenty years ago could end only in confusion and the stultification of whatever force the poems may have once had" (Fitts 1956: xiii). But a few years later, when he published an essay on translation entitled “The Poetic Nuance,” first as a “privately printed” volume produced by Harcourt “for the friends of the author and his publishers” (Fitts 1958), then in Reuben Brower’s Harvard University Press anthology On Translation (Brower 1959), it was clear that Fitts’s translation theory hadn’t changed at all. He argued the same basic ideas, which continued to be the canons of Anglophone poetry translation, made available by both trade and academic publishers and underwritten by Fitts’s prestige as a translator and reviewer. Thus the point of “The Poetic Nuance” was that “The translation of a poem should be a poem, viable as a poem, and, as a poem, weighable” (Fitts 1958: 12). Yet the only kind of poem Fitts recognized was written in a fairly standard American English, punctuated by familiar and socially acceptable colloquialisms. To present his argument, Fitts first discussed a poem by the Mexican Enrique González Martínez that constituted an “attack upon the spurious elegance of poeticism” (ibid.: 13). Then he used his own version of an epigram by Martial, in which he expanded the first line of the Latin text into two English lines, inserting words and phrases (“drink,” “personal,” “when the toasts go round the table”) to create a scene that is more realistically detailed and therefore a translation that is more transparent:

Quod nulli calicem tuum propinas, humane facis, Horme, non superbe.

You let no one drink from your personal cup, Hormus, when the toasts go round the table.
Haughtiness?
Hell, no.
Humanity.

(Ibid.: 25)

Fitts read the Latin text as Martial’s “joke” about Hormus’ unsavoury “hygiene,” concluding that “his fun depends largely upon the composure of his form, the apparent decorum of his words” (ibid.), particularly his use of the word humane (“Humanity”). In Fitts’s reading “Hormus is personally so unclean that even he has enough hygienic sense not to press upon another a cup that he himself has been using”; hence “his bad manners are really humanitarianism” (ibid.: 22). Fitts’s translation signified this reading by breaking the “decorum” of his English, shifting from the conversational, extremely prosaic register of the first two lines to a relatively formal, slightly British abstraction (“Haughtiness”) to a staccato slang expression (“Hell, no”). The shift from elite formality to popular slang inscribed the Latin text with a class hierarchy, making the joke depend on the reader’s acknowledgement that Hormus was violating class distinctions – and improperly so (whether through the seeming “Haughtiness” that signals his social pretensions or through his “bad manners”). Fitts’s translation, like his reading, constructed a socially superior position from which to laugh at the character, but the fluency of the English made this elitism seem natural.

Fitts evidently felt a deep ambivalence towards modernist translation. He shared Pound's valorization of linguistic precision in reading and translating earlier poetries. Fitts's enthusiastic foreword to Mary Barnard's 1958 version of Sappho praised her perception that the Greek texts were written in a "pungent downright plain style" requiring an appropriately "plain" English:

Some say a cavalry corps,
some infantry, some, again, will maintain that the swift oars of our fleet are the finest sight on dark earth; but I say that whatever one loves, is.

I do not see how that could be bettered. Like the Greek, it is stripped and hard, awkward with the fine awkwardness of truth. Here is no trace of the "sweete slyding, fit for a verse" that one expects to find in renderings of Sappho. It is exact translation; but in its composition, the spacing, the arrangement of stresses, it is also high art. This, one thinks, is what Sappho must have been like.

(Barnard 1958: ix)

Yet Barnard's version was "exact," not so much because she found a true equivalent to the Greek text – she herself later admitted that she used "padding," making the fragments more continuous – but rather because she was influenced by Pound (Barnard 1984: 280–4). She corresponded with Pound during the 1950s while he was confined at St Elizabeth's, and she showed him her versions of Sappho, revising them in accordance with his recommendation that she use "the LIVE language" instead of "poetik jarg" (ibid.: 282). This recommendation dovetailed with Barnard's reading of Sappho's poetry, which was partly modernist ("It was spare but musical"), partly romantic ("and had, besides, the sound of the speaking voice making a simple but emotionally loaded statement"). Barnard finally developed a fluent strategy that produced the effect of transparency, seeking "a cadence that belongs to the speaking voice" (ibid.: 284), and Fitts appreciated this illusionistic effect, taking the English for the Greek text, the poem for the poet: "This, one thinks, is what Sappho must have been like."

But even though both Fitts and Barnard joined in Pound's valorization of linguistic precision, they were unable to share his interest in a more fragmentary and heterogeneous discourse – that is, in a translation strategy that preempted transparency. Thus Barnard ignored passages in Pound's letters where he questioned her adherence to standard English grammar ("utility of syntax? waaal the chink does without a damLot") as well as her cultivation of a "homogene" language:

it is now more homogene / it is purrhapz a bit lax / whether one emend that occurs wd/ lax it still more ???
 it still reads a bit like a translation /

what is the maximum abruptness you can get it TO?

Fordie: “40 ways to say anything”

I spose real exercise would consist in trying them ALL.

(Barnard 1984: 283)

Fitts, in turn, praised Barnard’s Sappho because it was “homogene,” because it used “exact” current English without any “spurious poeticism, none of the once so fashionable Swinburne-Symonds erethism”: “What I chiefly admire in Miss Barnard’s translations and reconstructions is the direct purity of diction and versification” (Barnard 1958: ix).

By the 1950s Fitts had already reviewed Pound’s writing on a few occasions, gradually distancing himself from his early approval.⁴ His negative review of Pound’s translations typified the midcentury reaction against modernism: he attacked the most experimental versions for the distinctively modernist reason that they didn’t stand on their own as literary texts. “When he fails,” Fitts wrote, “he fails because he has chosen to invent a no-language, a bric-a-brac archaizing language, largely (in spite of his excellent ear) unsayable, and all but unreadable” (Fitts 1954: 19). Fitts revealed his knowledge of Pound’s rationale for using archaism – namely, its usefulness in signifying the cultural and historical remoteness of foreign texts. But he rejected any discursive strategy that did not assimilate those texts to prevailing English-language values, notably current standard usage, because the resulting translation was not sufficiently transparent to produce the illusion of originality:

True, Daniel wrote hundreds of years ago, and in Provençal. But he was writing a living language, not something dragged out of the remoter reaches of Skeat’s Etymological Dictionary. He said autra gens, which is “other men,” not “other wight”; he said el bosc l’auzel, not “birds quhitter in forest”; and so on. Pound [...] may have “absorb[ed] the ambience,” but he has not written a “poem of his own”; he has simply not written a poem.

(Ibid.)

Phrases like “living language” and “poem of his own” demonstrate that Fitts was very selective in his understanding of Pound’s translation theory and practice, that he did not share Pound’s interest in signifying what made the foreign text foreign at the moment of translation. On the contrary, the domesticating impulse is so strong in Fitts’s review that foreign words (like “autra gens”) get reduced to the most familiar contemporary English version (“other men”) as if this version were an exact equivalent, or he merely repeats them, as if repetition had solved the problem of translation (“he said el bosc l’auzel, not ‘birds quhitter in forest”). Like Davie, Fitts ignored Pound’s concept of interpretative translation, evaluating the Daniel versions as English-language poems, not as study guides meant to indicate the differences of the Provençal texts. And, again, the poems Fitts found acceptable tended to be written either in a fluent, contemporary English that was immediately intelligible or in a poetic language that seemed to him unobtrusive enough not to interfere with the evocation of a coherent speaking voice. Hence, like many other reviewers, Fitts most liked what Pound called his “Major Personae”: “We may look upon The Seafarer, certain poems in Cathay, and the Noh Plays as happy accidents” (ibid.). Fitts’s work as a translator and as an editor and reviewer makes quite clear that the innovations of modernist translation were the casualty of the transparent discourse that dominated British and American literary cultures.

These innovations were generally neglected in the decades after the publication of Pound’s translations. British and American poets continued to translate foreign-language poetry, of course, but Pound’s experimental strategies attracted relatively few adherents. And those poets who pursued a modernist experimentalism in translation found their work dismissed as an aberration of little or no cultural value. Perhaps no translation project in the post-World War II period better attests to this continuing marginality of modernism than Celia and Louis Zukofsky’s remarkable version of Catullus.

Working over roughly a ten-year period (1958–69), the Zukofskys produced a homophonic translation of the extant canon of Catullus’s poetry, 116 texts and a handful of fragments, which they published in a bilingual edition in 1969 (Zukofsky and Zukofsky: 1969).⁵ Celia wrote a close English version for every Latin line, marked the quantitative meter of the Latin verse, and parsed every Latin word; using these materials, Louis wrote English-language poems that mimic the sound of the Latin while also attempting to preserve the sense and word order. The Zukofskys’ preface, written in 1961, offered a very brief statement of their approach: “This translation of Catullus follows the sound, rhythm, and syntax of his Latin – tries, as is said, to breathe the ‘literal’ meaning with him” (Zukofsky 1991: 243). Refusing the free, domesticating practice that fixed a recognizable signified in fluent English, the Zukofskys followed Pound’s example and stressed the signifier to make a foreignizing translation – that is, a version that deviated from the dominant transparency. This foreignizing process began in their title, where they retained a Latin version that possessed both a scholarly elegance and the promise of a narrow, if not inscrutable, specialization: Gai Valeri Catulli Veronensis Liber (in a close rendering, “The Book of Gaius Valerius Catullus from Verona”). One reviewer was moved to write that “their no-English title offers to elucidate nothing” (Braun 1970: 30).

Below is one of Catullus’s brief satiric poems, done first by Charles Martin, whose fluent translation explicitly adopts Dryden’s free approach, and then by the Zukofskys, whose discourse is marked by abrupt syntactical shifts, polysemy, discontinuous rhythms:

Nulli se dicit mulier mea nubere malle
 quam mihi, non si se Iuppiter ipse petat.
 dicit: sed mulier cupido quod dicit amanti,
 in vento et rapida scribere oportet aqua.

My woman says there is no one she'd rather marry than me, not even Jupiter, if he came courting.
 That's what she says – but what a woman says to a passionate lover ought to be scribbled on wind, on running water.
 (Martin 1990: xxiv)

Newly say dickered my love air my own would marry me all whom but one, none see say Jupiter if she petted.
 Dickered: said my love air could be o could dickered a man too in wind o wet rapid a scribble reported in water.
 (Zukofsky 1991: no. 70)

Although both versions could be considered paraphrases that give a fair estimation of the Latin sense, the Zukofskys' homophonic translation is obviously more opaque, frustratingly difficult to read on its own and only slightly easier if juxtaposed to a transparent version like Martin's.

The opacity of the language is due, however, not to the absence of meaning, but to the release of multiple meanings specific to English. Jean-Jacques Lecercle (1990) describes such effects of homophonic translation as the "remainder," what exceeds transparent uses of language geared to communication and reference and may in fact impede them, with varying degrees of violence. As at least one reviewer of the Zukofskys' Catullus realized (the classicist Steele Commager), homophonic translation is an analogue of a modern French cultural practice, traduscon, translating according to sound, a method that always results in a proliferation of ambiguities (Commager 1971). In the Zukofskys' version, the Latin word "dicit," from dicere, a verb meaning "to say," is rendered homophonically as the English "dickered," which carries some of the sense of "say" if it is taken as "haggled" or "bargained," but which in this erotic context becomes an obscene colloquialism for sexual forms of intercourse. The sequence "my love air" translates "mulier" ("woman"), but the homophonic method adds the English word "air," and this sets going more possibilities, especially in a text that skeptically compares the woman's profession of her love to wind. "Air" also puns on "ere," introducing an archaism into a predominantly modern English lexicon and permitting a construction like "my love, ere my own, would marry me." The pun on "air" bears out Lecercle's observation that the remainder is the persistence of earlier linguistic forms in current usage, "the locus for diachrony-within-synchrony, the place of inscription for past and present linguistic conjunctures" (Lecercle 1990: 215). He acknowledges the foreignizing effect of these choices by comparing the homophonic translator to the speaker for whom a foreign language is a treasury of strange but fascinating sounds, and the speaker is caught between the urge to interpret them, the pervasive need to understand language and the fascinated desire to play with words, to listen to their sound, regardless of their meanings.

(Ibid.: 73)

The Zukofskys' homophonic translation didn't "interpret" the Latin words in the sense of fixing a univocal meaning, easy to recognize. But they did "listen to their sound," and what they heard was a dazzling range of Englishes, dialects and discourses that issued from the foreign roots of English (Greek, Latin, Anglo-Saxon, French) and from different moments in the history of English-language culture.⁶

To signify the foreignness of Catullus's poetry, then, Louis Zukofsky not only sought to bend his English into conformity with the Latin text and the diverse materials Celia provided him; he also cultivated the discursive heterogeneity that distinguishes modernist translation, releasing the remainder in language, recovering marginal cultural forms to challenge the dominant. Many of the English texts are cast in a sixteenth-century poetic language, distinctively Elizabethan, even Shakespearean. This includes isolated words – "hie" (no. 51), "hest" (no. 104), "bonnie" (no. 110) – but also substantial sections that evoke the blank verse of English Renaissance drama:

Commend to you my cares for the love I love, Aurelius, when I'm put to it I'm modest – yet if ever desire animated you, quickened to keep the innocent unstained, uninjured, cherish my boy for me in his purity;
(Zukofsky 1991: no. 15)

[...] Could he, put to the test, not sink then or not devour our patrimonies?
In whose name, in Rome's or that of base opulence –
(Ibid.: no. 29)

No audacious cavil, precious quaint nostrils, or we must cavil, dispute, o my soul's eye, no point – as such – Nemesis rebuffs too, is the vehement deity: laud her, hang cavil.
(Ibid.: no. 50)

There are also strains of an eighteenth-century elegance ("perambulate a bit in all cubicles" [no. 29], "darting his squibs of iambs" [no. 36], "tergiversator" [no. 71]), a modernist, Joycean experimentation ("harder than a bean or fob of lapillus" [no. 23], "O quick floss of the Juventii, form" [no. 24]), and a scientific terminology taken from biology and physics (“micturition” [no. 39], “glans” and “quantum” [no. 88], “gingival” [no. 97]). Last but not least in effect is a rich assortment of colloquialisms, some British (“a bit more bum” [no. 39]), most American, chosen from different periods in the twentieth century and affiliated with different social groups: “side-kick” (no. 11), “canapes” (no. 13), “don’t conk out” (no. 23), “collared” (no. 35), “faggots” (no. 36), “moochers” (no. 37), “hunk” (no. 39), “amigos” (no. 41), “suburban” (no. 44), “con” (no. 86), “bra” (no. 55), “hick” (no. 55), “kid” (no. 56), “mug” (no. 57), “homo” (no. 81). In the homophonic context created by the Zukofskys’ translation practice, individual words echo, becoming nodes of different dialects and discourses. In no. 70 (quoted above on p. 187), “say” can also mean “for the sake of argument,” “for example,” or even be a clipped form of the archaic “save”; “see” can be an abbreviated form of “you see.” These possibilities give a punchy, colloquial turn to the phrasing, gangster lingo with an Elizabethan archness: “Newly, say, dickered”; “none, see, save Jupiter.” A line in no. 17 – “your lake’s most total paludal puke” – sounds like a 1950s teenage hipster. There is even a trace of African-American dialect (“pa’s true bro” [no. 111], “they quick” [no. 56]), most pronounced in one of the strongest translations:

O rem ridiculum, Cato, et iocosam, dignamque auribus et tuo cachinno.
ride, quidquid amas, Cato, Catullum:
res est ridicula et nimis iocosa.
deprendi modo pupulum puellae trusantem: hunc ego, si placet Dionae, protelo rigida mea cecidi.

Cato, it was absurd, just too amusing, fit for your ears & fit to make you cackle!
You’ll laugh if you love your Catullus, Cato:
it was absurd & really too amusing!
Just now I came across a young boy swiving his girlfriend, and – don’t take offense now, Venus!
I pinned him to his business with my skewer.
(Martin 1990: no. 56)

O ram ridicule home, Cato, the jokes some dig, now cool your ears so the two cock in – no.
Read: they quick, kid, almost as Cato, Catullus:
raciest ridicule it may not miss jokes.
Prehended a mode of pupa, loon boy lay crux on to her: and cog I, so placate Dione, pro tale, o rig it all, me I cogged kiddie.
(Zukofsky 1991: no. 56)

The narrow range of Martin's modern lexicon is highlighted by his use of "swiving," which here seems less the archaism that it is (Chaucerian) than a polite euphemism for sexual activity, comparable to "business" or "skewer." The Zukofskys' homophonic version again shifts abruptly between discursive registers, from contemporary slang ("dig," "cool") to pseudo-archaic construction ("it may not miss jokes") to scientific term ("pupa") to Elizabethanese ("cog") to contemporary colloquialism ("kiddie"). These shifts are foreignizing because, in their deviation from transparency, they force the Anglophone reader to confront a Catullus that consists of the most extreme linguistic and cultural differences, including self-difference – a self-critical tendency that questions the source of his own amusement (the head-shaking phrase, "the jokes some dig") and points to his own sexual excess, even suggesting a homoerotic relationship between himself and Cato ("they quick, kid, almost as Cato [and] Catullus"). This sort of self-consciousness is so faint as to be absent from both the Latin ("ride, quidquid amas, Cato, Catullum") and Martin's version ("You'll laugh if you love your Catullus, Cato"). Martin's goal was the evocation of "the poet's voice" (Martin 1990: xiii), and this meant a fundamental domestication that fixed a clear, modernized meaning in the Latin text by assigning Catullus the standard English dialect dotted with the odd slang word or archaism; the Zukofskys' goal of approximating the sound of the Latin led them to sound the many voices, standard and nonstandard, that constitute English speech and writing.

The discursive heterogeneity of the Zukofskys' Catullus mixes the archaic and the current, the literary and the technical, the elite and the popular, the professional and the working-class, the school and the street. In its recovery of marginal discourses, this translation crosses numerous linguistic and cultural boundaries, staging "the return within language of the contradictions and struggles that make up the social" (Lecerclre 1990: 182), exposing the network of social affiliations that get masked by the illusionistic effect of transparency. And since the Zukofskys' Catullus calls attention to the social conditions of its own English-language effects, it interrogates the unified appearance that English is given in fluent versions like Martin's, showing instead that when we speak of "English," we speak of a multiplicity of dialects, registers, and styles, of the sedimentation of past conjunctures, of the inscription of social antagonisms as discursive antagonisms, of the coexistence and contradiction of various collective arrangements of utterance, of the interpellation of subjects within apparatuses embodied in linguistic practices (schools, the media).

The recovery of the marginal in the Zukofskys' Catullus challenges the illusionism of versions like Martin's, whereby a standard English dialect and the dominant translation discourse (i.e. transparency) come to appear the right choices for the Latin text, the means to establish a true equivalence. The Zukofskys' translation shows, on the contrary, that these English-language cultural forms are not so much “right” as conservative, engaged in the maintenance of existing linguistic norms and literary canons and therefore exclusive of other cultural forms. The Zukofskys’ effort to admit the marginal makes their translation seem strange in English because it is abusive, not just of transparent discourse, but of the Latin text as well. For there can be no doubt that their version, no matter how “close” to the Latin, enacts an ethnocentric violence in its imposition of translation effects that work only in English, in an Anglophone literary culture. They take responsibility for this violence, however, by opening up the standard dialect to the nonstandard on the basis of a canonical author, unsettling linguistic and literary hierarchies in English.

This translation certainly seemed strange to reviewers, who with rare exceptions criticized it in the most damning terms. And the sense of strangeness was measured, not surprisingly, against the canons of fluent translation, which several reviewers formulated so as to make clear its origins in the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In the Grosseteste Review, an English magazine usually sympathetic to modernist poetics, Hugh Creighton Hill found fault with the Zukofskys’ Catullus because it violated the domesticating translation practice favored by Johnson: “According to Samuel Johnson the duty is one of changing one language into another while retaining the sense, hence the main reason [to translate] would be to present the meaning of an otherwise incomprehensible writer in recognisable terms” (Hill 1970: 21). In Arion, an academic journal devoted to classical literature, Burton Raffel echoed a string of English translation theorists from Dryden to Tytler when he suggested that translating Catullus required “(a) a poet, and (b) an ability to identify with, to almost be Catullus over a protracted period” (Raffel 1969: 444). Raffel praised Peter Whigham’s 1966 Catullus for achieving the domestication that Denham and Dryden recommended: “it is recognizably like what Catullus might have said, had he been alive and well in London” (ibid.: 441). Raffel’s valorization of transparency permitted him to appreciate only those instances in the Zukofskys’ version where the illusionistic effect of authorial presence was the strongest; and again the terms of his praise recalled countless English commentators on translation during the Enlightenment: “Zukofsky’s rendering [of 2a] is easy, graceful; it has an air of confidence, and it warms to the touch as you read it over and over” (ibid.: 437). In Poetry Review the poet and translator Nicholas Moore agreed with Raffel – and the humanist assumptions of their Enlightenment forebears: “To really get the spirit of an original postulates a kinship of temperament and even style over and beyond time, language, nationality and milieu” (Moore 1971: 182). Moore also judged the Zukofskys’ version against the eighteenth-century reception of Catullus’s poetry, praising “the essential simplicity” of the Latin texts while inadvertently showing the domestication at work in this reading with a comparison to several English poets: Catullus, Moore felt, is “a sort of mixture of Herrick and Burns with the sharpness of Pope and freedom of the Restoration thrown in here and there” (ibid.: 180). These comments demonstrate quite clearly that even in the late 1960s and early 1970s, the centuries-old canons of fluent translation continued to dominate British and American literary cultures.

The fact is that the Zukofskys' Catullus posed a cultural threat to unsympathetic reviewers, driving them to make explicit, extreme, and somewhat contradictory statements about the value of transparent discourse. In the literary magazine Chelsea Daniel Coogan, a teacher of foreign languages at the City University of New York, asserted that he "can find little to praise in this translation" because "it is an essential principle of poetry that it be clear" (Coogan 1970: 117). In the New Statesman the English poet Alan Brownjohn praised James Michie's recent version of Catullus as "a performance of immense lucidity and pace," while attacking the Zukofskys' as "knotted, clumsy, turgid and ultimately silly" (Brownjohn 1969: 151). The demand for immediate intelligibility was so intense in the reviews that words like "gibberish," "unreadable," and "mad" get repeatedly applied to the Zukofskys' translation. For Robert Conquest writing in Encounter, to take their project as "seriously" as they did "is to feel the chill wind from the abysses of unreason" (Conquest 1970: 57).

But the reviews also bear witness to the unreason of transparency. After earlier stating that "I am not so naive as to believe that I do not myself have theories of translation, too!" Raffel contradicted himself by concluding that "translation cannot be accomplished under the aegis of a theory, but only under the protection of the Muse, who will tolerate theory, who can make use of madness, but who cannot excuse failure to perform" (Raffel 1969: 437, 445). Raffel questioned whether the Zukofskys' translation "theory" had any use at all, whether aesthetic, scholastic or otherwise. Yet instead of rationalizing the use he found most desirable, he reverted to an anti-intellectual assertion of aesthetic value as self-evident, the mystifying Muse that transcends the limitations of time and space, the differences of language and culture. He, like Coogan and Brownjohn, was willing to license only that kind of translation "performance" that conceals its own assumptions and values with the illusionistic effect of transparency. Raffel's anti-intellectualism manifested itself, not merely in his preference for the sweeping judgment over the theoretically nuanced argument, but also in his rather unreflective assumption that transparent discourse truly represents the foreign text or, indeed, the foreign author: "no one should have done this book: it does not perform, and it is neither translation nor Catullus" (ibid.: 445).

Raffel's concern about the use value of the Zukofskys' work showed that he equated translation with domestication; their Catullus was foreignizing, high in abuse value. Nicholas Moore similarly complained that the Zukofskys' translation "doesn't relate to the present in any real way" (Moore 1971: 185), ignoring the contemporary lexicons on which it draws and failing to admit his own deep investment in a fairly standard dialect of English tilted towards Britishisms. He exemplified his privileged discourse by translating several of Catullus's poems and publishing his versions with his review. Here is no. 89 done by him and the Zukofskys:

Gellius est tenuis: quid ni? cui tam bona mater
 tamque valens uiuat tamque venusta soror tamque bonus patruus tamque omnia plena puellis cognatis, quare is desinat esse macer?
 qui ut nihil attingat, nisi quod fas tangere non est, quantumuis quare sit macer inuenies

Coldham is rather run-down, and who wouldn't be!
 With so kindly and sexy a mother,
 With a sister so sweet and lovable,
 With a kindly uncle and such a large circle of Girl-friends, why should he cease to look haggard?
 If he never touched any body that wasn't taboo,
 You'd still find dozens of reasons why he should look haggard!
 (Moore 1971)

Gellius is thin why yes: kiddin? quite a bonny mater tom queued veil lanced viva, tom queued Venus his sister tom queued bonus pat 'truce unk,' tom queued how many plenum pullets cognate is, query is his destiny emaciate?
 Kid if he only tingled not seeing what dangler's there, honest can't he wish where thin sit maker envious.
 (Zukofsky 1991)

In effect, Moore was recommending a wholesale Anglicization of the Latin text, down to using the most current English ("sexy") and discarding the Latin name for a British-sounding one ("Coldham"). The Zukofskys' version offered their estranging combination of archaism ("bonny"), Britishism ("queued"), American colloquialism ("bonus," "unk"), and Latinate words, both popular ("viva," as in "Viva Gellius's mother") and scientific ("plenum"). The discursive heterogeneity stops the reader from confusing the English text with the Latin one, insists, in fact, on their simultaneous independence and interrelatedness (through homophony), whereas Moore's fluency blurs these distinctions, inviting the reader to take a domesticated version for the "original" and to ignore the linguistic and cultural differences at stake here.

The marginality of modernist translation projects like the Zukofskys' extended into the following decades, both in and out of the academy. Not only did the innovations of modernism inspire few English-language translators, but the critical commentary these innovations received was shaped by the continuing dominance of transparent discourse – which is to say that they were treated dismissively, even by the fledgling academic discipline of translation studies. This is apparent in Ronnie Apter's Digging for the Treasure: Translation after Pound.

Apter sought to distinguish Pound's achievement as a poet-translator from that of his Victorian predecessors and then measure his influence on later Anglophone poetry translation, mainly in the United States. But she was not fond of the most daring modernist experiments. Although her discussion included many translators, well-known as well as obscure (Kenneth Rexroth, Robert Lowell, Paul Blackburn, W. S. Merwin), she totally ignored the Zukofskys' Catullus, preferring instead to comment on the free, colloquial version of Catullus 8 that Louis Zukofsky included in his volume of poems, Anew (1946). For Apter, what was valuable about this version was its evocation of a familiar speaking voice, its illusion of transparency: "the effect recreates Catullus's pain as if he were alive today" (Apter 1987: 56). In line with many other reviewers and critics, she also professed greater admiration for Pound's "Major Personae" than for the interpretative translations in which he pushed his discourse to heterogeneous extremes. "His translation experiments are interesting," Apter observed, "but not entirely successful" (ibid.: 67).

The criterion of "success" here is fluent, domesticating translation where discursive shifts are unobtrusive, scarcely noticeable, and current usage is not defamiliarized by nonstandard forms. Thus Apter praised Blackburn's Provençal translations because "he develops a diction in which both modern colloquialisms and deliberate archaisms seem at home" (Apter 1987: 72). But Pound's version of Arnaut Daniel's "L'aura amara" "is marred by pseudo-archaic excursions" and "ludicrous" renderings, making it "sometimes marvelous and sometimes maddeningly awful" (ibid.: 70, 71, 68). Apter definitely shared part of the modernist cultural agenda, notably the "emphasis on passion and intellect combined." And she went so far as to inscribe this agenda in Pound's translations, calling his versions of Daniel "Donne-like," using T. S. Eliot's reading of "metaphysical" poetry to describe an English-language translation of a Provençal text and then naively concluding that it was Pound, not she, who "has made a semi-successful comparison of Arnaut Daniel and John Donne" (ibid.: 71). The kind of translation Apter preferred, however, was not modernist, but Enlightenment, not historicist, but humanist, lacking the distancing effect of the foreign, transparent. She praised Burton Raffel's version of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight because "Raffel has a knack of getting his readers to identify with the emotions of the fourteenth-century characters," who come to "seem all too human" (ibid.: 64).⁷

3 The formation of a modernist poet-translator

The reaction against modernism in English-language translation during the postwar period limited the translator's options and defined their cultural and political stakes. Most translators chose a fluent, domesticating practice that reduced the foreign text to dominant cultural values in English, above all transparent discourse, but also a varied range of concepts, beliefs, and ideologies that were equally dominant in British and American cultures at this time (Judeo-Christian monotheism, Enlightenment humanism, cultural elitism). The few translators who chose to resist these values by developing a foreignizing practice, taking up the innovations pioneered by Pound to signify the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text, encountered condemnation and neglect. The ways in which this cultural situation constrained the translator's activity, the forms of resistance that a modernist translator might adopt at the margins of Anglophone literary cultures, are pointedly illustrated by the career of the American poet Paul Blackburn (1926–71). The overriding question in this assessment of Blackburn's career is twofold: How did his translation projects come to negotiate the dominance of transparency and other values in postwar American culture? And to what extent can he serve as a model of how to resist this dominance?

Pound played a crucial role in Blackburn's formation as a poet-translator. It was under Pound's influence that Blackburn began studying Provençal troubadour poetry in 1949–50, when he was an undergraduate student at the University of Wisconsin. Blackburn's account, in an interview given some ten years later, shared the skepticism towards academic institutions that Pound voiced on many occasions, particularly the view that existing curricula did not include earlier poetries validated by a modernist cultural agenda. Blackburn cast himself as the advocate of modernism, forcing a revision in the university curriculum by reviving older course offerings:

What got me started on Provençal was reading squibs of it in The Cantos and not being able to understand it, which annoyed me. It hadn't been taught at Wisconsin since the 30's, so I found Professor [Karl] Bottke, the medievalist out there, who offered to tutor me in it. I needed the course for credit, and to give credit he needed five students. I got him eight and we had a very good course.

One of Blackburn's classmates, Sister Bernetta Quinn, who subsequently devoted several critical studies to Pound's writing, described the course as an effort "to act upon their master's counsel" in works like The Spirit of Romance (Quinn 1972: 94). She also noted that Blackburn's imitation of the "master" evolved into a translation project: "Many of our class assignments, refined, appeared in 1953 in Blackburn's Proensa, a revelation of the beauty to be found in troubadour song 'made new' and a tribute to the influence of Pound" (ibid.).

Published by the poet Robert Creeley's Mallorca-based Divers Press, Proensa was a bilingual translation of eleven texts by seven Provençal poets. It was on the basis of this work that Blackburn received a Fulbright fellowship to continue his Provençal studies at the University of Toulouse during 1954–5. When the fellowship ended, he stayed in Europe for a couple more years, at first teaching English conversation at Toulouse while researching Provençal manuscripts and editions at French and Italian libraries, then moving through towns in Spain and Mallorca, writing his own poems and translating. By 1958, Blackburn had produced a substantial book-length translation of troubadour poetry. As he put it in a postcard to Pound (dated "IV. 17. 58"),

I have the anthology of troubadours licked now. 105 pieces (cut fr/150 – and want to bet they’ll want to cut it more?). But the works, fr. G[uille]m. to Cardenal, Riquier and Pedro de Aragon. (1285). 8 years on this job. I hv. an extra carbon without notes, if you will send it back after a bit. Just say you care to see it.⁸

Perhaps the most decisive moment in Blackburn’s apprenticeship as a modernist poet-translator was his correspondence with Pound. Beginning in 1950 and continuing off and on until 1958, Blackburn wrote to Pound at St Elizabeth’s and occasionally visited him after relocating to New York. With these letters Blackburn frequently sent Pound his translations, seeking detailed, word-by-word criticisms as well as answers to specific questions about the Provençal texts. Pound’s first response, scrawled over a single sheet of paper, encouraged Blackburn to develop a translation discourse that “modernized off Joyce onto Ford” (10 Feb. 1950). Later Pound explicitly endorsed Blackburn’s translations, instructing Dorothy Pound to write that “you have a definite feeling for the Provençal and should stick to it” and then arranging for the publication of one version. In a typescript added to Dorothy’s letter, Pound wrote: “[Peire Vidal’s] ‘Ab l’alen’ sufficiently approved for Ez to hv/ forwarded same to editor that pays WHEN he prints” (12 Aug. 1950).

Most importantly, Pound’s letters furthered Blackburn’s education in the modernist cultural agenda. Pound’s first response attacked language use in the United States from the standpoint of modernist poetics:

The fatigue,
The “ , my dear Blackpaul, of a country where no exact statements are ever made!!

(10 Feb. 1950)

Pound suggested that Blackburn read certain troubadours from modernist angles: “Pieire Cardinal was not hiding under aestheticism” (undated; 1957?); “Try Sordello” (1 Dec. 1950). He recommended that Blackburn meet other modernist poets living in New York, such as Jackson MacLow (4 July 1950). And he urged Blackburn to study cultural and economic history “to set the stuff IN something,” to situate his Provençal translations in a historical context (25 Jan. 1954?). Pound repeatedly criticized academic institutions for failing to teach a sense of history and sometimes even quizzed Blackburn on historical figures:

Ignorance of history in univ/ grads/ also filthy, blame not the pore stewddent, but the goddam generations of conditioned profs/ /// thesis fer Sister B/ :
absolute decline of curiosity re/ every vital problem in U,S. educ/ from 1865 onward. whentell did Agassiz die? anyhow.)

(20 March 1950)

The sense of history that Pound taught in these letters avoided any wholesale reduction of the past to the present, as well as any reduction of the present to the past. The former led to “‘modernizing’/curricula, i.e. excluding any basic thought from ALL the goddam univs” (20 March 1950), whereas the latter led to an antiquarianism without contemporary relevance: “merely retrospective philology LACKS vitality” (1957?). The “vitality” came from allowing the historical difference of earlier cultures to challenge the contemporary cultural situation. “BLACKBURN,” Pound wrote, “might git some life into it IF he/ wd/ extend his curiosity;” and then he provided a reference to the historian Brooks Adams’s Law of Civilization and Decay (1895): “Vid Brooks Adams/ Civ/ & Dec Knopf reissue! p. 160” (25 Jan. 1954?).

The fact that Blackburn was learning from this correspondence is clear in his 1953 review of Hugh Kenner’s study The Poetry of Ezra Pound. Blackburn described Pound’s “strongest and most criticized positions”: his “case for the honorable intelligence as against the material cunning of usurers” and “his insistence on definition and exactitude as against muddle, the deliberate obscuring of facts and downright mendacity” (Blackburn 1953: 217). In this rather negative review, Blackburn affected a cranky tone that sounded remarkably like Pound, questioning Kenner’s decision to criticize the critics of The Cantos: “He puts a mouthful of teeth in those moth-eaten wolves, journalism and education, and that other pack of elderly puppies who run with what he calls ‘the upper-middlebrow literary press,’ and then proceeds to beat them off” (ibid.: 215). The question Blackburn addressed to Kenner, as well as to every reader of Pound’s poetry, was why waste time on the dunderheads? Spend your honest effort positively, do the honest work, educate from the top, where there is any. Kung says: “You can’t take all the dirt out of the ground before you plant seed.”

(Ibid.: 216)

Blackburn seems to be alluding to Pound’s Confucianism in The Cantos (“Kung says”), an allusion that casts Blackburn as Pound, establishing a process of identification for the reviewer (an aspiring poet-translator), yet in a way that is recognizable to the reader of the review, understood as a pose. The correspondence further complicates the allusion by revealing another, more competitive level of identification: this passage from Blackburn’s review is a plagiarism; the tone, the ideas, even the words are actually Pound’s. Blackburn was quoting from one of Pound’s letters to him, although without acknowledgement:

Acc/ Kung : not necessary to take all the dirt out of the field before yu plant seed.

Hindoo god of wealth inhabits cow dung. Del Mar: gold mining not only ruins the land, it ruins it FOREVER. No reason to sleep on a middan.

bombs no kulchurl value.

IF possible to educate from the top??

where there is any top, but at least from where one IS.

(12 Aug. 1950)

Pound's adage-like directive to Blackburn – "Acc/Kung" – seems to suggest that preexisting cultural materials are "necessary" for innovations, however regressive those materials might appear ("the dirt"). And indeed this paradox is signified in Pound's fractured language, "Acc/Kung," a pun on "Achtung" ("attention") that made the adage at once Chinese and German, a recovery of Confucianism with a fascistic overtone – the topical resonance of "Achtung" would have been more pronounced, and more ideologically significant, to an English-language reader in the Cold War era. Blackburn's review transformed this passage from Pound's letter into a directive that the critic allow the current cultural situation, however regressive, to determine the "requisite labor," the sort of commentary that will change that situation into one more favorable to Pound's poetry (Blackburn 1953: 215). In the case of Kenner, this meant educating the educators ("the top") about Pound's "form or technique or the materials, or what follows from them, what they lead to" (ibid.). Blackburn charged Kenner with "a too-simple discipleship" while he himself presumably exemplified a more complicated one, as we now know, apparent in his plagiarized quotations from Pound's letters.

In this plagiarism, Blackburn at once assumed and qualified Pound's identity, recommending a strategic appropriation of modernism at a moment when it occupied a marginal position in American culture. Blackburn's strategy required an interrogation of Pound's modernist cultural politics, revising it to intervene into a later social situation. He faulted Kenner for an "uncritical" acceptance of Pound's modernism without facing the economic and social axes of his criticism, and the conclusions these entail. The poet, this poet, as economic and social reformer, is a dilemma all of us must face eventually. It must be faced before it can be worked. The problem cannot be ignored, nor will any uncritical swallowing of the man's facts and theories do. And it is useless and ignorant to abuse him, simply. There is more than one madhouse in Washington these days.

(Blackburn 1953: 217)

The correspondence shows that Blackburn's identity as poet-translator was not only modernist, but masculinist. It was constructed on the basis of an oedipal rivalry with Pound, in which Blackburn sought approval and encouragement from his poetic father in frank, personal letters that linked his writing to sexual relationships with women. The oedipal nature of this rivalry shapes Blackburn's bohemian self-portrait in the correspondence, his deviations from bourgeois respectability, his occasional use of obscenities ("The defense is to not give a fuck"). His letters imitated the gruff colloquialism of Pound's letters, but far exceeded them in shock value (Pound doesn't go beyond "goddam"). After Pound wrote that he submitted Blackburn's version of Peire Vidal's "Ab l'alen" to an editor (12 Aug. 1950), Blackburn's response made clear the oedipal configuration of his authorial identity:

T H A N K Y O U , P O U N D . And the dry season is over! Have been sitting here trying to divert me by reading. NG. Other diversions physical better for the health et alli. Going to sources like sex and finally getting it relaxed and fine and broke the drought in a shower of somethingorother. Pure peace: to go into a woman relaxed, i.e. in control of the tensions; to sit and write again, i.e. in control of the tensions. So up and about and seeing and doing and feeling.
(Early Sept. 1950?)

Although this remarkable passage opens with Blackburn thanking Pound "for the practical encouragement" of submitting the translation, it quickly begins to suggest that Blackburn himself "broke the drought" in his writing through "sex." Blackburn does not challenge Pound in any direct way: one of the striking things about the passage is the conspicuous omission of any first-person pronouns that would indicate Blackburn's agency. This passage constructs only one subject-position, Pound's, as the culturally powerful poet. Yet an agent appears in the sudden syntactical break at "broke the drought," which assumes an "I," distinct from Pound, and thus hints at the sexual competition underlying Blackburn's identity as poet-translator. This identity is fundamentally a patriarchal construction requiring the female to be an object of male sexuality so that Blackburn might regain his "control" over his writing. A sexual exploitation of "a woman" displaces Blackburn's literary dependence on Pound.

A few months later, on his twenty-fifth birthday, Blackburn wrote a long letter to Pound that continued this link between writing and sexuality. This time another canonical writer is invoked, and the sexual partners multiply:

A month ago, three weeks, something, I got rid of two girl friends, picked fights, having adequate reasons, broke off. A month later both grace my bed at intervals, much more secure because of the honesty regained in their and my reassessments. One doesn't break off relationships. Stories don't end. Shxpr knew and killed off all his major characters, ending THEIR story: la seule methode effectif.

(24 Nov. 1950)

Blackburn is again "in control," devising his own, sexually powerful concept of "honesty," writing his own narrative as well as those of his "girl friends," here likened to Shakespearean characters as he is to Shakespeare.

This is the double triangle of Blackburn's authorial identity: the rivalry with Pound is worked out through a sexual dominance over women and an identification with other canonical writers:

Funny thing, fear of death. I am twenty-five on this date. Seen, faced, lived with, worked with, d e a t h. We are all familiars with it, the twenty-five to thirty group. Somewhat, someh o w.

The defense is to not give a fuck.

I am defenseless.

I care about too much.

Your position too. Why you are where you are.

Elective affinities. Good title. (G. was afraid of his genius.)

(Loved many worthy and unworthy women and married – his housekeeper.)

(Ibid.)

Blackburn's imitation of the discontinuous writing in Pound's letters resulted in a suggestive free-associating that revealed not only the height of his poetic ambitions (Goethe), but also their sexual conditions. The rivalry with Pound, at once literary and sexual, finally becomes explicit near the end of this letter:

Would you care to see more [translations]? I'll make copies. Reminding me I shall get you some texts of such stuff for xmas. I want to give you something. If you need anything I could find for you let me know. I am unreliable and faithful. If that makes sense to you. I am faithful to two remarkable women at the same time.

(Ibid.)

Blackburn is "faithful" to Pound in his respect for the elder writer's literary authority, but "unreliable" in his effort to challenge that authority through assertions of his sexual potency (i.e. when he is "faithful to two remarkable women at the same time").

It is impossible to know what Pound thought of such personal revelations. None of his letters referred to them. Still, after this last revealing letter from Blackburn, Pound seems to have broken off the correspondence, which was not resumed for three years. "Is anything wrong?" Blackburn suddenly wrote in 1953, "Or is it, on your part, a cessation of correspondence? And do you object if I write you from time to time, if the latter shot is the case?" (4 July 1953). The correspondence had become important enough to Blackburn's sense of himself as a writer that he needed merely to write to Pound, without getting any response.

Late in the correspondence, Blackburn's rivalry emerges in a choice to translate an obscene Provençal text that Pound, in an access of bourgeois squeamishness, refused to translate. This was "Puois en Raimons e n Trues Malecs," written by the poet that inspired Pound's most innovative translations: Arnaut Daniel. In The Spirit of Romance, Pound had called Daniel's text a "satire too rank for the modern palate" (Pound 1952: 35). Blackburn, however, translated it, and on 3 January 1957, writing from Malaga, he sent it to Pound. Here is a strophe:

Better to have to leave home, better into exile, than to have to trumpet, into the funnel between the griskin and the p-hole, for from that place there come matters better not described (rust-colored). And you'd never have the slightest guarantee that she would not leak over you altogether, muzzle, eyebrow, cheek.

In a cover letter, Blackburn pronounced his translation successful, "fair literal and the spirit is there," and he acknowledged Pound's earlier sense of its obscenity by adding that "it will never be published." Blackburn viewed obscene language as the prerogative of the modernist poet who uses a colloquial discourse, following William Carlos Williams, and in his interview with David Ossman he treated such language as male:

if you want to start from the point of view that speech, and that common speech even, is a very fair and valid medium for poetry, you're going to find some people whose common speech is commoner than most. That would include a lot of male members – ladies usually watch their language fairly carefully, and that's only right.

In 1959, soon after Blackburn contracted with Macmillan to publish his Provençal translation, he again wrote to Pound and suggested that obscenity was the prerogative of the male poet-translator:

Macmillan bringing out the troubadours in a condensed version in spring, if I get the intro. done. I believe I have saved the literal of 'tant las fotei com auziretz' but on the whole, whenever they complained about strong language, I suggested cutting the piece entirely from the book. Marcabru, Guillem VII etc. had no protestant tradition to deal with. Jeanroy cutting, eliminating those stanzas completely in his fr. literal version in the edition. His wife read the proofs?

(5 Feb. 1959)

Blackburn had rendered the Provençal fotei as "fucked." The interest in obscenity, expressed in the version of "Truc Malecs" as well as this letter, illustrates how the rivalry with Pound determined Blackburn's translation projects, occasionally in very direct ways.

The most intensely masculinist expression of this rivalry, at once intersubjective and intertextual, involves a text by Bertran de Born, a celebration of feudal militarism on which both Pound and Blackburn worked: "Bem platz lo gais temps de pascor." Pound had done a version of it in The Spirit of Romance, partly in verse and partly in prose, to illustrate his claim that "De Born is at his best in the war songs":

E altresim platz de senhor
Quant es primiers a l'envazir
En chaval armatz, sens temor, Qu'aissi fai los seus enardir
 Ab valen vassalatge,
E puois que l'estorns es mesclatz,
Chascus deu esser acesmatz
 E segrel d'agradatge,
Que nuls om non es re preztatz
Tro qu'a maintz colps pres e donatz.

Massas e brans elms de color
E scutz trauchar e desgarnir
Veirem a l'intrar de l'estor
E maintz vassals ensems ferir,
 Dont anaran aratge
Chaval dels mortz e dels nafraz;
E quant er en l'estorn entratz
 Chascus om de paratge,
No pens mas d'asclar chaps e bratz,
Que mais val mortz que vius sobratz.
(Thomas 1971: 132)

Thus that lord pleaseth me when he is first to attack, fearless, on his armed charger; and thus he emboldens his folk with valiant vassalage; and then when stour is mingled, each wight should be yare, and follow him exulting; for no man is worth a damn till he has taken and given many a blow.

We shall see battle axes and swords, a-battering colored haumes and a-hacking through shields at entering melee; and many vassals smiting together, whence there run free the horses of the dead and wrecked. And when each man of prowess shall be come into the fray he thinks no more of (merely) breaking heads and arms, for a dead man is worth more than one taken alive.

(Pound 1952: 35)

Even though this is a fairly close version, Pound develops a heterogeneous English-language discourse to indicate the historical remoteness of the Provençal text – most obviously, an archaic lexicon. The word “stour” renders the Provençal estorn, estor, meaning “struggle,” “conflict” (Levy 1966). Pound’s choice is virtually a homophonic equivalent, a calque, but it is also an English-language archaism, meaning “armed combat,” initially in Anglo-Saxon, but retained in Middle and Early Modern English as well. It appears in Gavin Douglas’s Aeneid, among many other literary texts, prose and poetry, “pre-Elizabethan” and Elizabethan. Pound’s curious use of “colored haumes” for the Provençal “elms de color” (“painted helmets”), effectively increases the archaism in the translation, but its etymology is uncertain, and it may not strictly be an archaic English word: it seems closer to a variant spelling of the modern French for “helmet,” heaume, than to any archaic English variants for “helm” (cf. OED, s.v. “helm”). What the archaism made seem foreign in this text was the militaristic theme, which Pound at once defined and valorized in a suggestive choice. He translated “chascus om de paratge” as “each man of prowess,” rejecting the possibilities of “paratge” that are more genealogical (“lineage,” “family,” “nobility”) and more indicative of class domination, in favor of a choice that stresses a key value of the feudal aristocracy and genders it male: “valour, bravery, gallantry, martial daring; manly courage, active fortitude” (OED, s.v. “prowess”).

In 1909, a year before the publication of The Spirit of Romance, Pound had published an adaptation of Bertran’s text, “Sestina: Altaforte,” in which he used the same archaizing strategy. Here, however, Pound celebrated the mere act of aggression, characterized as distinctively aristocratic and masculinist, but devoid of any concept of bravery:

The man who fears war and squats opposing
 My words for stour, hath no blood of crimson
 But is fit only to rot in womanish peace
 Far from where worth’s won and the swords clash
 For the death of such sluts I go rejoicing;
 Yea, I fill all the air with my music.

(Pound 1956: 8)

As Peter Makin has argued, Pound’s appropriations of earlier poets like Bertran serve “as an exemplum, a demonstration of a possible way of living,” and they are laden with various cultural and ideological determinations (Makin 1978: 42). Makin links the “phallic aggressiveness” of “Sestina: Altaforte” to Pound’s esteem for “the ‘medieval clean line’” in architecture, as well as to his eulogies of dictators past and present, like Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta of Renaissance Rimini and Benito Mussolini, “a male of the species” (Makin 1978: 29–35; Pound 1954: 83).

Blackburn included a translation of Bertran’s poem in the troubadour anthology he mentioned to Pound in 1958. He followed Pound’s example by pursuing a modernist translation strategy, resorting to free verse with the most subtly intricate rhythms and making an inventive selection of archaisms. Blackburn’s translation is a strong performance that competes favorably against both of Pound’s appropriations of the Provençal text:

And I love beyond all pleasure, that lord who horsed, armed and beyond fear is forehead and spearhead in the attack, and there emboldens his men with exploits. When stour proches and comes to quarters may each man pay his quit-rent firmly, follow his lord with joy, willingly, for no man's proved his worth a stiver until many the blows

 he's taken and given.

Maces smashing painted helms, glaive-strokes descending, bucklers riven:
this to be seen at stour's starting!
And many valorous vassals pierced and piercing striking together!
And nickering, wandering lost, through the battle's thick, brast-out blood on broken harness, horses of deadmen and wounded.

And having once sallied into the stour no boy with a brassard may think of aught, but the swapping of heads, and hacking off arms – for here a man is worth more dead than shott-free and caught!
 (Blackburn 1958: 119–20)

“Quit-rent,” “vassals,” “glaive-strokes” – Blackburn created a lexicon that was obviously medieval, and he occasionally mimicked Anglo-Saxon patterns of rhythm and alliteration (“brast-out blood on broken harness”). Yet his translation discourse was not only historicizing, but foreignizing: some of the archaisms are decidedly unfamiliar, or anachronistic, used in later periods than the Middle Ages. “Stiver,” a small coin, is first used in the sixteenth century. The verb “nicker” is a nineteenth-century usage for “neigh,” appearing in such literary texts as Sir Walter Scott’s novel The Monastery (1820). “Brassard” is French for “armor,” but in English it constitutes another nineteenth-century usage, this time Victorian, adding a touch of Pre-Raphaelite medievalism to the translation. The word “proches” is also French, at least in spelling; in Blackburn’s translation it is a pseudo-archaic neologism, an Anglicized French word that appears to be an archaic variant spelling of “approaches” but actually isn’t (no such spelling is recorded in the OED).

And of course there is the borrowing from Pound, “stour,” one of many such borrowings that recur throughout Blackburn’s translations (Apter 1987: 76–7 and Apter 1986). Apter has argued that they constitute a “homage” to Pound “as the source of [Blackburn’s] interest in and guide to the translation of Provençal lyrics” (1987: 77). But insofar as the borrowings insert Pound’s language in a different context, their meaning is variable, and they can just as well signify a competition with Pound, even a betrayal. Blackburn’s borrowing of “stour” allows his translation to contest Pound’s appropriations of Bertran’s poem, and the rivalry is figured, interestingly enough, in provocative revisions that interrogate the ideological determinations of Pound's texts. Thus, in striking contrast to Pound, Blackburn rendered "chascus om de paratge" as "no boy with a brassard," The phrase creates dizzying possibilities of meaning. It can be taken as a modern colloquialism, an affectionate expression of male bonding. Blackburn used "boys" in this way at the beginning of Guillem de Poitou's Companho, faray un vers ... covinen:

I'm going to make a vers, boys ... good enough,
 But I witless, and it most mad and all Mixed up, mesclatz, jumbled from youth and love and joy –

Yet the singular "boy" in the translation can be taken as another sort of colloquialism, a masculinist expression of contempt, usually for another's weakness. Even taken in its most accepted meaning ("male child"), Blackburn's use of "boy" neatly ironizes Bertran's eulogy of feudal militarism, branding it as childish, unmanly, and deleting the suggestion of aristocratic domination in "paratge." What is interesting here is that Blackburn's oedipal rivalry with Pound, although possessing a masculinist configuration in itself, paradoxically leads to a translation that questions the poetic father's phallic aggressiveness, his investment in the feudal patriarchy figured in the Provençal texts.

This rivalry drove Blackburn to exceed Pound in the development of a translation discourse that Pound himself had pioneered. And given the oedipal construction of their relationship, it was inevitable that the discursive competition would get played out over the troubadour representations of the lady. Just as Pound produced his innovative work with Cavalcanti by challenging the Pre-Raphaelite image of the lady in Rossetti's versions (Pound's poetic "father and mother"), so Blackburn increased the heterogeneity of his translations and questioned Pound's investment in the patriarchal images of the Provençal love lyric.

Female characters in Provençal poetry are often the objects of male sexual desire, but their representation varies according to their class. Aristocratic women undergo a spiritual and physical idealization, transformed into a passive ornament by the elaborately worked imagery of their lovers, who meet with varying sexual success; women of lower classes receive a more realistic treatment involving forms of seduction that range from pleasant cajoling to brutal intimidation. For The Spirit of Romance Pound translated Marcabru's "L'autrier jost'un sebissa," which he identified as a "pastorella," a dialogue in which a knight riding through the country comes upon a farm girl and attempts to seduce her. Pound's version is written in precise, current English, lightly archaized:

L'autrier jost'un sebissa trobei pastora mestissa,
 de joi e de sen massissa,
 si cum filla de vilana,
 cap' e gonel' e pelissa

vest e camiza trelissa, sotlars e caussas e lana.

Ves lieis vinc per la planissa:
“Toza, fim ieu, res faitissa, dol ai car lo freitz vos fissa.” “Seigner, som dis la vilana, merce Dieu e ma noirissa, pauc m’o pretz sil vens m’erissa, qu’alegreta sui e sana”

“Toza, fi’m ieu, cauza pia, destors me sui de la via per far a vos compaignia;
quar aitals toza vilana
no deu ses pareill paria pastorgar tanta bestia en aital terra, soldana,”

(Dejeanne 1971: 33)

The other day beside a hedge
I found a low-born shepherdess,
Full of joy and ready wit,
And she was the daughter of a peasant woman;
Cape and petticoat and jacket, vest and shirt of fustian,
Shoes, and stockings of wool.

I came towards her through the plain, “Damsel,” said I, “pretty one,
I grieve for the cold that pierces you.”
“Sir,” said the peasant maid,
“Thank God and my nurse
I care little if the wind ruffle me,
For I am happy and sound.”

“Damsel,” said I, “pleasant one,
I have turned aside from the road
To keep you company.
For such a peasant maid
Should not, without a suitable companion,
Shepherd so many beasts
In such a lonely place.”

(Pound 1952: 62–3)

Pound’s version is again rather close, and it is not distinguished by prosodic and lexical invention. His sharpest departure from the Provençal, however, is extremely pointed: he used the archaism “damsel” to render the knight’s epithet for the shepherdess, “toza,” which Emil Levy defined as “jeune file” (“young girl”) (Levy 1966), yet with an unsavory connotation, “fille de mauvaise vie” (“immoral girl”). (The Provençal text also stigmatizes the girl with “mestissa,” a reference to her low birth that likewise carries the sense of “mauvais, vil.”) Pound’s use of “damsel” at once idealizes and ironizes the image of the girl, sarcastically marking her inferior social position and portraying the knight as a wittily devious seducer, out to overcome her resistance with flattering appeals to her (presumed) class aspirations.

Pound so enjoyed the knight’s predatory sexuality that he wistfully imagined the girl yielding at last. After quoting his partial translation of the poem, he added that “The adventure is finally brought to a successful termination” (Pound 1952: 63). But the fact is that the girl withstands the knight’s advances and concludes the dialogue with some cryptic wit of her own – in Frederick Goldin’s rendering, “Don, lo cavecs vos ahura, que tals bad’en la pintura qu’autre n’espera la mana.”

“Master, that owl is making you a prophecy:
this one stands gaping in front of a painting, and that one waits for manna.”

(Goldin 1973: 77)

Blackburn translated Marcabru’s entire text, and his version quite clearly borrows lines from Pound’s, while just as clearly revising the father’s phallic aggressiveness:

The other day, under a hedge
I found a low-born shepherdess, full of wit and merriment and dressed like a peasant’s daughter:
her shift was drill, her socks were wool, clogs and a fur-lined jacket on her.

I went to her across the field:
– Well, baby! What a pretty thing.
You must be frozen, the wind stings ...
– Sir, said the girl to me,
thanks to my nurse and God, I care little that wind ruffle my hair, I’m happy and sound.

– Look, honey, I said, I turned into here and out of my way

just to keep you company.
Such a peasant girl ought not without a proper fellow pasture so many beasts alone in such a wild country.

(Blackburn 1958: 24)

Blackburn worked hard to surpass Pound on every level. His inventive prosody aimed to mimic the song-like sound effects of the Provençal text, evoking the music of Christopher Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love," especially at the end of the first stanza. And he created a translation discourse that sampled the most varied lexicons, past ("drill") and present ("honey"), British ("proper fellow") and American ("pretty thing"), standard usage ("sir") and slang ("baby"). In a later version, Blackburn coarsened the colloquialism "pretty thing" into "pretty piece," revealing at the outset the knight's sexual designs on the girl and treating him (instead of her, as in the Provençal "toza") in the most unsavoury way, as some sort of sex-crazed 1950s hipster given to pornographic come-ons: "Well, baby! What a pretty piece" (Blackburn 1986: 35). Blackburn continues this ironic image of the knight by revising the Provençal text at "pareill paria" (roughly "social equals," "your fellows," "your peers"), which he translated as "proper fellow," suggesting both the knight's superior social position and the moral impropriety concealed by his "proper" accent. Blackburn's mixture of archaism with current usage juxtaposes the cultural representations from two periods, allowing them to interrogate one another: the coarse contemporary slang demystifies the more formal rhetorical effects (troubadour and Marlovian) that mystified aristocratic domination (in medieval Provence and Elizabethan England); and the archaism defamiliarizes the most recent and familiar sexual terms ("pretty piece") by exposing their complicity with masculinist images of women in past aristocratic literary cultures.

This interrogative effect of Blackburn's mixed lexicons strengthens his version of the shepherdess's cryptic conclusion – which Pound misread and suppressed. In Blackburn's version, she describes the mystifying rhetoric of feudal patriarchy as an archaic-sounding "simple show" and then unmasks it as a distraction from the material conditions of the seduction, not the transcendental mana in the Provençal text, but the unequal social relations in which she and the knight are involved, signified here by a colloquialism, "the lunch basket":

– Sir, the owl is your bird of omen.
There's always some who'll stand open-mouthed before the simple show, while there's others'll wait until the lunch basket comes around.

(Blackburn 1958: 25)

Given the interrogative effects of its mixed lexicon, Blackburn's translation can be read as a critique of the ideological determinations, both aristocratic and masculinist, that shape Pound's version as well as Marcabru's text.

Blackburn's Provençal translations are the distinguished achievement of a modernist poet-translator. Taking up the innovations that Pound developed in his versions of troubadour poets like Arnaut Daniel, Blackburn cultivated a discursive heterogeneity to signify the linguistic and cultural differences of the Provençal texts. And he did it by recovering various English-language dialects and discourses – residual, dominant, emergent. There is a rich strain of archaism, partly medieval, partly Elizabethan, suggestive of Chaucer, Douglas, Sir Philip Sidney, Shakespeare: “the king's helots,” “choler,” “her soft mien,” “seisin,” “cark,” “sire,” “wench,” “harlotry,” “puissance,” “haulberk,” “doublets,” “thee,” “forfend,” “dolors,” “gulls,” “escutcheon,” “villeiny,” “beyond measure.” And there is an equally rich strain of contemporary colloquialism, occasionally British (“tart”), but mostly American, including slang and obscenity from the 1950s, but cutting across different periods, cultural forms (elite and mass), and social groups: “jay-dee,” (for “juvenile delinquent”), “phonies,” “push-cart vendor,” “budged,” “cash,” “grouch,” “make-up,” “goo,” “asshole,” “cunt,” “the doc,” “we'll have some lovin’,” “all of ‘em crapped out,” “balls,” “this bitch,” “hard-up,” “shell out,” “nymphos,” “creeps,” “hide-the-salami,” “skimpy,” “floored,” “you sound like some kind of nut,” “Mafiosi,” “garage,” “steamrolls,” “a pain in his backside,” “hassle,” “keep his eye peeled for them,” “shimmy,” “90 proof.” Blackburn's multiple lexicons are also multilingual, including Provençal (“trobar,” “canso,” “vers”), French (“fosse,” “targe,” “copains,” “maistre”), and even Gallicized pseudo-archaism (“cavalage,” drawn from the Provençal encavalgar, “to ride a horse”).

Blackburn's various discursive strategies included syntactical peculiarities adopted by Pound. Dudley Fitts's review of Pound's translations took exception to their syntax: after quoting a line from Pound's Daniel, “Love inkerlie doth leaf and flower and bear,” Fitts complained that “Those, Reader, are verbs, not nouns” (1954: 19). Blackburn likewise used nouns as verbs, frustrating the reader's grammatical expectations with phrasing that was strange (“I grouch”), but also evocative (“the night they sorcered me”).

Blackburn's prosody owes a debt to Pound's recommendations “as to the use of canzoni in English, whether for composition or in translation” (Anderson 1983: 217). Pound felt that some English “rhymes are of the wrong timbre and weight” for the intricately rhymed stanza in Provençal and Italian, and to compensate he developed a “rhyme-aesthetic” that differed from the foreign texts, as well as from current stanzaic forms in English-language poetry: “Against which we have our concealed rhymes and our semi-submerged alliteration” (ibid.). Blackburn's acute sense of word placement and timing led to varying patterns of internal and end rhyme that sometimes heightened the anachronism of his lexical mix, the clash of different cultures, different historical periods – like the “okay”/“atelier” rhyme in his version of Guillem de Poitou's Ben vuelh que sapchon li pluzor:

I would like it if people knew this song, a lot of them, if it prove to be okay when I bring it in from my atelier, all fine and shining:
for I surpass the flower of this business, it's the truth, and I'll produce the vers as witness when I've bound it in rhyme.

(Blackburn 1986: 12)

Blackburn's attention to the musicality of the Provençal text assumes Pound's discussion of "melopoeia" in the canso and canzone: "the poems of medieval Provence and Tuscany in general, were all made to be sung. Relative estimates of value inside these periods must take count of the cantabile values" of the work, "accounting for its manifest lyric impulse, or for the emotional force in its cadence" (Anderson 1983: 216, 230). For Pound, this rhythm-based lyricism produced an effect that was individualistic but also masculinist, constructing a lyrical "I" in the translation that was explicitly male: "I have in my translations tried to bring over the qualities of Guido's rhythm, not line for line, but to embody in the whole of my English some trace of that power which implies the man," what Pound later called "a robustezza, a masculinity" (ibid.: 19, 242). But Pound's most innovative translations tended to diverge from his modernist critical representations of the foreign texts, principally because his translation discourse was so heterogeneous, full of textual effects that undermined any illusionism, any sense of the foreign author's presence, any coherent "I." In the same way, Blackburn's lyrical prosody definitely constructs a subject-position with which the listener/reader can identify, but the rhythms are always varying, asymmetrical at points, and the lexical and syntactical peculiarities are constantly foregrounding the textuality, weakening the coherence of the speaking voice, splintering the discourse into different cultures and periods, even different genders (depending on the genre), now locked in a mutual interrogation. Here is the opening of Blackburn's version of Cercamon's Ab lo temps qe refrescar:

With the fine spring weather that makes the world seem young again, when the meadows come green again
I want to begin with a new song
on a love that's my cark and desire, but is so far I cannot hit her mark or my words fire her.

I'm so sad nothing can comfort me, better off dead, for foul mouths have separated me from her, Goddamn them – o,

I would have wanted her so much!
Now I grouch and shout, or weep, or sing or walk about like any hare-brained golden thing.

And how lovely she I sing is! more than I know how to tell you here.
Her glance is straight, her color's fresh and white, white without blemish, no she wears no make-up.
They can say no hard word of her, she is so fine and clear as an emerald.

(Blackburn 1958: 17)

Blackburn's odd rhythms and diction destabilize the reader's sympathetic identification with the lyric voice, preventing the translation from being taken as the "original," the transparent expression of the foreign author, and instead insisting on its second-order status, a text that produces effects in English, distinct from the Provençal poem but also departing from contemporary English usage, possessing a powerful self-difference, a sudden shifting from the familiar to the unfamiliar, even to the unintelligible.

Blackburn's translation of Provençal poetry is clearly more accessible than the Zukofskys' Catullus, requiring a less aggressive application to appreciate because of a more inviting lyricism. But it too follows Pound's innovations by developing a translation discourse that is both historicist and foreignizing, that signals the cultural differences of the foreign texts through a linguistic experimentalism. The project is marked by the emulative rivalry with Pound that formed Blackburn's identity as a modernist poet-translator, determining not only the choice of texts and the development of a translation discourse, but also a revisionism that critiques Pound's own appropriations of the same texts, questioning their investment in aristocracy, patriarchy, individualism – ideological determinations that also marked Blackburn's writing in varying degrees and across many different forms (letters, poems, translations, interviews).

Blackburn's rare comments on his work suggest that he saw it along these or related lines. In a 1969 interview he responded to the question, "What poets have influenced your work?" by citing Pound, Williams, Creeley, Charles Olson, whose poetry he read because "I wanted to find out who my father was" (Packard 1987: 9). Blackburn may not have psychoanalyzed his relationship to Pound, but after translating for some two decades and spending many years in analysis, he definitely possessed a psychoanalytic view of the translating process, of the relationship between the translation and the foreign text, the translator and the foreign author. “I don’t become the author when I’m translating his prose or poetry,” he said in the interview, but I’m certainly getting my talents into his hang-ups. Another person’s preoccupations are occupying me. They literally own me for that time. You see, it’s not just a matter of reading the language and understanding it and putting it into English. It’s understanding something that makes the man do it, where he’s going. And it’s not an entirely objective process. It must be partially subjective; there has to be some kind of projection. How do you know which word to choose when a word may have four or five possible meanings in English? It’s not just understanding the text. In a way you live it each time, I mean, you’re there. Otherwise, you’re not holding the poem.

(Ibid.: 13)

English translation theorists from the seventeenth century onward had recommended a sympathetic identification between the translator and the foreign author. In Alexander Tytler’s words, “he must adopt the very soul of his author, which must speak through his own organs” (Tytler 1978: 212). Yet this sort of sympathy was used to underwrite the individualism of transparent translation, the illusion of authorial presence produced by fluent discourse: it was Tytler’s answer to the question, “How then shall a translator accomplish this difficult union of ease with fidelity?” Blackburn’s modernist sense of identification acknowledged that there could never be a perfect sympathy, that the translator developed a “projection,” a representation, specific to the receiving culture, that interrogated the foreign author, exposing “his hang-ups.” When Blackburn’s translator is “there,” the sense of immediacy comes not from any direct apprehension of the foreign text, but from living out an interpretation that enables the translator to “hold the poem,” rationalize every step in the translation process, every choice of a word.

In responding to a 1970 questionnaire from the New York Quarterly Blackburn used similar psychological terms to describe the textual effects of translation, observing that the translator’s identification changes the foreign author, but also the translator himself, who increasingly becomes the site of multiple subjectivities, a deviation from rational norms:

He must be willing (& able) to let another man’s life enter his own deeply enough to become some permanent part of his original author. He should be patient, persistent, slightly schizoid, a hard critic, a brilliant editor [...] We are all hundreds, maybe thousands of people, potentially or in fact.

(Blackburn 1985: 616)

In both the interview and questionnaire Blackburn’s view of the poet-translator is insistently masculinist: the process of identification or “projection” occurs between men. In the interview, it was part of Blackburn’s bohemian self-presentation, where he abruptly segued from a discussion about “writing in a travel situation” to “girl-watching”: “To come back to the city, though, the subway is an incredible place for girl-watching. You find one face or a good pair of legs – you can look at them for hours” (Packard 1987: 14). And yet if, in Blackburn’s account, translation multiplies subjectivities by mediating cultural differences, it can only explode any individualistic concept of identity, masculinist or otherwise. Blackburn felt that the range of different demands made on the translator was extreme, resulting in deviancy and derangement, inviting allusions to popular cultural forms, like blues and rock-and-roll (or even more specifically the blues-based rock of Bob Dylan’s 1965 album Bringing It All Back Home), linking the translator to other racial and youth subcultures:

In your view, what is a translator?

A man who brings it all back home.
In short, a madman.

(Blackburn 1985: 616)

4 Modernist translation as cultural politics

Blackburn’s Provençal project was decisive in his personal formation as an author. Yet since this identity-forming process occurred in writing, the translation could also be conceived as a strategic public intervention, a cultural political practice that was resistant to dominant values in the United States and ultimately international in its reach.

Blackburn was of course aware that the psychological processes he described so facetiously could be figured only in discursive strategies. And these he saw as a challenge to bourgeois ideals, not just to individualistic concepts of identity, but to a moralistic sense of propriety in conduct and language. As early as 1950, in a letter to Pound, he remarked on “the impossibility of translating poems written in a twelfth century aristocratic vocabulary into MODERN ENGLISH POEMS written in a twentieth century bourgeois vocabulary” (24 Nov. 1950). Twenty years later, in response to the question, “How far should a translator attempt to ‘modernize’ an antiquarian piece?” Blackburn acknowledged that the translator must draw on current English usage, but he also advocated a linguistic experimentalism that recovered marginal discourses, even with canonical literary texts:

Try first to find a diction, a modern diction, which will translate as many values as possible of the original. I’ve seen Latin poetry translated into hip language that works very well for certain pieces. Carried too far, of course, over a whole body of work, it’d be a stunt. Some stunts, however, are brilliantly executed.

(Blackburn 1985: 617)

Blackburn's investment in Provençal poetry was partly due to the troubadours' anti-bourgeois themes, present not only in the celebration of feudal aristocratic values, but also in a representation of the troubadours culled partly from the biographical details in the vidas and razos. Some troubadours were itinerant performers born to commoners – farmers, tradesmen, merchants – but later living and working on the margins of feudal courts; others were landless knights, somewhat migrant, their loyalties drifting among various lords and ladies. In his poem “Sirventes” (1956), a satire “against the city of Toulouse,” Blackburn adopts a troubadour persona and invokes Peire Vidal, portraying him as a bohemian poet, a beatnik, intent on offending any bourgeois sense of decency:

That mad Vidal would spit on it, that I as his maddened double do – too changed, too changed, o
 deranged master of song, master of the viol and the lute
 master of those sounds,
 I join you in public madness,
 in the street I piss
 on French politesse that has wracked all passion from the sound of speech.
 A leech that sucks the blood is less a lesion. Speech!
 this imposed imposing imported courtliness, that the more you hear it the more it's meaningless & without feeling.
 (Blackburn 1985: 89–90)

In the Provençal translations Blackburn sometimes tilts his lexicon heavily towards contemporary English, inscribing the troubadour poem with a satire on capitalist economic practices, on businessmen and lawyers. This occurs with another of Bertran de Born's war songs, No puosc mudar un chantar non esparga. In Blackburn's version the marauding knight becomes more criminal, more gangster-like – “A good war, now, makes a niggardly lord / turn lavish and shell out handsomely” – but the knight is also more business-like, given to financial planning (“expenditures”) and living in suburbia:

have I not taken blows upon my targe?
 And dyed red the white of my gonfalon?
 Yet for this I have to suffer and pinch my purse, for Oc-e-No plays with loaded dice.
 I'm hardly lord of Rancon or Lusignan that I can war beyond my own garage without an underwriter's check.

But I'll contribute knowledge and a good strong arm with a basin on my head and a buckler on my neck!
 (Blackburn 1958: 116)

Blackburn actually addressed the social implications of translation on one occasion: in "The International Word," an article he contributed to a special issue of The Nation devoted to culture and politics. Published in 1962, on the eve of the Cuban Missile Crisis, when Blackburn was serving as poetry editor of this leftwing magazine, "The International Word" argues that a modernist cultural politics can effectively intervene in the current global situation: in Blackburn's diagnosis, "the crisis of identity of the individual in a world whose underlying realities are the cold war and the bomb" (Blackburn 1962: 358). In a survey of contemporary American poetry Blackburn found the most politically engaged poets to be modernist: his litany includes Pound, Williams, the Objectivists, Black Mountain, the Beats, the New York School – figures and tendencies that had recently been presented as oppositional in Donald Allen's 1960 anthology, The New American Poetry. Blackburn noted Pound's insistence "on the values of bringing across other sensibilities in other languages and from all periods of history and civilization" (Blackburn 1962: 357) and assigned translation a key geopolitical role: "the mutual insemination of cultures is an important step in what our policy makers think of as international understanding" (ibid.: 358). In this politicized rationale for cultural exchange modernist translation was summoned to resolve a domestic crisis, searching foreign cultures to supply the lack of confidence in the "official values" of Cold War American culture:

The Cold War and the possibly imminent illumination of the world have created another reaction in poets [...] There is an affirmation, a reaffirmation, of values, a searching of the older cultures, both American and foreign, modern and ancient, for values to sustain the individual in a world where all the official values have let us down entirely by being in the main hypocritical (consider the phrase "business ethics" for a moment), the religions attenuated to the point where even the monks are screaming from the pinch.

(Ibid.: 359)

Blackburn's concern about the "identity of the individual" did not assume a liberal individualism grounded in concepts of personal freedom, self-determination, psychological coherence; he rather saw human identity as other-determined, a composite constructed in relationships to "values" that were transindividual, cultural and social, housed in institutions like the state, the church, the school. If translation could change the contours of subjectivity, Blackburn thought, then it could contribute to a change in values, away from "the military stance and the profit motive" towards less strained geopolitical relations, "perhaps breadth of understanding for other peoples, a greater tolerance for and proficiency in other languages, combined with political wisdom and expediency over the next two generations” (ibid.: 358).

Some of Blackburn’s remarks have come to seem much too optimistic. He judged from “the current flood of translations in both prose and poetry” that “The ducts of free exchange are already open in literature” (Blackburn 1962: 357, 358). But cultural exchange through translation wasn’t then (nor ever could be) “free” of numerous constraints, literary, economic, political, and English-language translation certainly wasn’t free in 1962. That year the number of translations issued by American publishers was actually small, approximately 6 percent of the total books published (Publishers Weekly 1963). We now know that translation rates in the United States reached their apex in the early 1960s, but they have consistently been quite low in contrast to foreign publishing trends since the Second World War, which show much higher percentages of translating English-language books.

Blackburn’s utopianism also has a pro-United States slant that seems too uncritical after numerous subsequent developments – the wars in Vietnam and Iraq, the political and military interventions in El Salvador and Nicaragua, Kuwait and Afghanistan, government skittishness on ecological issues, the emergence of multinational corporations, especially in publishing, where the number of English-language translations has fallen to less than 3 percent of the total books published. In 1962, however, Blackburn imagined that Perhaps even nationalism, so living a force today in Africa and the Far East, is beginning to die a little in the affluent West. Except for the political forms, Western Europe is on the threshold of becoming an economic unity. Is it an impossible dream to think of a bilingual America stretching from Tierra del Fuego to the Arctic Ocean, comprised of eighty-three states instead of fifty? Not by conquest but by union. How move more efficiently to raise the standard of living of underdeveloped countries in our own hemisphere than by removing the borders?

(Blackburn 1962: 358)

Readers in 1962 no doubt regarded this passage as a utopian flight. Blackburn himself called it “an impossible dream.” In the following year he published a somber article in Kulchur, “The Grinding Down,” which surveyed the current poetry “scene” and found modernism marginal and fragmented: “the Renaissance,” Blackburn wrote, “didn’t take”; it was now centered in a few small-circulation magazines, “making a place somewhere between the outer fringe of the academic and the inner sector of the so-called beat” (Blackburn 1963: 17, 10). In 1962 Blackburn was more sanguine about the prospects of modernism, but the emphasis on the “West” in his utopianism shows the difficulty of imagining relations between the hemispheres during the Cold War – even for a politically engaged poet-translator like him. The perspective from which he anticipated future global developments was clearly that of North American hegemony, allied with Western Europe in a strategic containment of Soviet expansionism, but permitted to indulge in some hemispheric expansion of its own (“eighty-three states”).

Blackburn’s article is valuable, not as a historical prediction or foreign policy, but rather as a theoretical model, useful in thinking how translation can be enlisted in a democratic cultural politics. Blackburn saw modernist translation as an effective intervention in American culture, based on a social diagnosis that found hegemonic values implicated in unequal or exclusionary social relations. Blackburn’s own translations, with their various foreignizing effects, served a leftwing internationalism, designed to combat the ideological forms of exclusion in Cold War America, perhaps most evident in the hysterical patriotism excited by hardening geopolitical positions (Whitfield 1991). The Provençal translation was especially subversive in this cultural situation because it revealed a broad range of influences, foreign and historical. The clear debt to modernism made the project vulnerable to Leslie Fiedler’s politicized attack on Pound’s translations for lacking a “center,” an allegiance to one national literature, American: “Our Muse is the poet without a Muse, whom quite properly we acquit of treason (what remains to betray?) and consign to Saint Elizabeth’s” (Fiedler 1962: 459).

Blackburn’s Provençal translation was marked, not only by a connection to an un-American poet-translator, but by an affiliation to popular culture through his resonant use of colloquialism. Cold War intellectuals associated popular culture with totalitarianism, mass thinking, brainwashing, but also with commercialism, egalitarianism, radical democracy. As the United States pursued a policy of Soviet containment abroad, at home intellectuals like Fiedler constructed a national culture of consensus that “depended explicitly upon the containment of intellectual radicalism and cultural populism alike” (Ross 1989: 47). In Robert von Hallberg’s view, “what is important to literary history is not only that this consensus existed but that its maintenance and definition depended somehow upon academic institutions. [...] To the extent that poets looked to universities for an audience, they were addressing [...] the audience that felt greatest responsibility for the refinement of taste and the preservation of a national culture” (Von Hallberg 1985: 34). Blackburn’s work with Provençal poetry both questioned and resisted this hegemonic tendency. Allied to a modernist poetic movement that defined itself as “a total rejection of all those qualities typical of academic verse” (Allen 1960: xi), Blackburn’s translation was radical in its ideological interrogations (of the foreign texts, previous English-language appropriations, contemporary American culture) and populist in its juxtaposition of elite and popular cultural discourses.

5 The history of a modernist translation project

The fate of Blackburn’s manuscript shows without a doubt that the cultural and political values represented by his translation continued to be marginal in the United States late into the 1970s. In Blackburn’s case, however, the marginality was not signalled by mixed reviews or bitter attacks or even media neglect, since there was never a publication to review. The manuscript that Blackburn felt was finished in 1958 did not see print for another twenty years.

In March 1958 the influential poetry critic M. L. Rosenthal, who had taught Blackburn briefly at New York University (1947), recommended the Provençal manuscript to Macmillan.⁹ In 1957, as poetry editor for The Nation, Rosenthal had accepted one of Blackburn's translations, his Pound-inspired version of Bertran de Born's Bem platz lo gais temps pascor. Rosenthal was now advising Emile Capouya, an editor in Macmillan's Trade Department, on a series of poetry volumes. Blackburn submitted the manuscript, tentatively entitled Anthology of Troubadours. It was a translation of sixty-eight texts by thirty poets, considerably reduced from the "105 pieces" that Blackburn mentioned to Pound, "cut fr/150" (17 March 1958). Capouya solicited an outside reader's report and then, despite a highly critical evaluation, accepted it for publication, issuing Blackburn a contract that paid a small advance ($150) against a full author's royalty (10 percent of the cover price, $3.50, with a first printing of 1500 copies), plus all the income from first serial rights (initial publications in magazines and anthologies). Although by October 1958 the contracts had been signed and countersigned, the manuscript was not complete: Blackburn needed to submit the introduction he had planned. Capouya scheduled the publication date for the fall of 1959, but Blackburn did not complete the manuscript, and the project languished until 1963, when, a few years after Capouya's departure from Macmillan, another editor decided to cancel the contract. During the 1960s Blackburn tried to get his manuscript accepted by other publishers, like Doubleday, who asked Rosenthal to evaluate the project. But these attempts were sporadic and without success. The translation at last appeared posthumously in 1978 as Proensa: An Anthology of Troubadour Poetry, edited by Blackburn's friend, the medievalist and poet George Economou, for the University of California Press.

Why didn't Blackburn complete a project that was certain to be published and under contractual terms that were favorable to the translator (despite the low advance)? Different answers have been offered for this question, ranging from Blackburn's unsettled personal life at the time (his divorce from his first wife, his financial straits) to a psychoanalytic assessment that found his relations with women, particularly his mother, the poet Frances Frost, linked to an "obsession" with "the idealization of woman as expressed by the Troubadours" (Eshleman 1989: 19). The Macmillan episode could only be determined by these private investments in a most public form, which here included a harsh reader's report. Sara Golden, Blackburn's second wife (1963–7), recalled that the report "sent Paul back to an endless spiral of revisions that never ended until his death" (interview, 23 Jan. 1992). Rosenthal described Blackburn as "appalled" by the report; the poet Robert Kelly, a friend of Blackburn's who edited some of his posthumous books, mentioned that "Paul was both hurt and amused by it" and would sometimes read out the criticisms in a comically exaggerated voice (interviews, 26 Dec. 1991 and 23 July 1992). Taken aback by these criticisms, after years of encouragement from writers like Pound and Creeley and from editors at magazines like Hudson Review, Origin, and The Nation, Blackburn did not complete the manuscript. On the contrary, he suddenly felt that it needed an enormous amount of work, not just an introduction and annotations, but substantial revisions of the translation. Unfortunately, he also lacked an editor to facilitate his completion of the project and bring it to press.

Capouya sought evaluations from powerful poet-translators and critics. He turned first to a poet and translator of Dante, John Ciardi, then associated with Saturday Review, who wrote back “Anthol of Troubadours sounds interesting” but declined because of prior commitments. Capouya then turned to Ramon Guthrie, an American poet who had lived in France for many years and was currently professor of French at Dartmouth. Guthrie (1896–1973) published his first books in the 1920s: translations and adaptations of troubadour poetry and a novel based on the texts of Marcabru. Under a pseudonym Guthrie also published The Legend of Ermengarde, described as an “exuberantly indecent poem” inspired by troubadour poetry (Gall 1980: 184). Capouya planned to publish Guthrie’s volume of poems, Graffiti, also recommended by Rosenthal, who suggested that Guthrie evaluate Blackburn’s translation. Perhaps in an effort to pique Guthrie’s interest, or to ward off any expectations of academic fidelity to the Provençal texts, Capouya’s letter described Blackburn’s project as “a collection of adaptations,” not the “anthology” he mentioned to Ciardi. Guthrie, it turned out, was actually the worst possible reader for Blackburn’s manuscript.

In the 1920s his own translations of Provençal texts were cast in current English usage with a slight Pre-Raphaelite archaism, in diction and verse form (a rhymed stanza). This is the opening of “Winter-Song,” Guthrie’s translation from Marcabru:

Since the withered leaves are shredded
 From the branches of the trees,
 Mauled and tousled and beheaded
 By the bitter autumn breeze,
 More I prize the sleety rain
 Than the summer’s mealy guile,
 Bearing wantonry and lewdness.

(Guthrie 1927a: 68)

Although Guthrie lived in Paris during the 1920s and was fond of evoking that modernist cultural moment in his later poetry, the poetry itself reveals him to be more Wordsworthian than Poundian:

Montparnasse
 that I shall never see again, the Montparnasse of Joyce and Pound, Stein, Stella Bowen, little Zadkine, Giacometti [...] all gone in any case, and would I might have died, been buried there.

(Guthrie 1970: 15)

By the 1950s, Guthrie had also become an academic, even though he lacked a high school diploma and had received the degrees for foreigners offered at the University of Toulouse. And this immersion in academic culture played into his evaluation of Blackburn's manuscript. His response was substantial and detailed, checking individual translations against the Provençal texts, giving what he called "suggestions" in a two-page report and many marginal comments scattered throughout the manuscript. He didn't mind Blackburn's use of obscenity, although in the 1920s he himself was sufficiently prudish to use a French pseudonym for a lewd parody and to bowdlerize his signed translation from Guillem de Poitou: "In which time – here we expurgate ... One hundred times and eighty-eight, / Till heart and back were both in great / Danger of breaking" (Guthrie 1927a: 59). Blackburn's version initially read "fucked," but he later struck it and added "loved." Guthrie encouraged Blackburn to use the obscenity, which perhaps served to confirm his own sense of masculinity, compensating for his earlier expurgation through another translator's work:

The word "loved" is too much like sneaking out the back-door. Why not either the original word in English as was, or "f – – – d" or leave it in Occitanian "las fotei?" In as legitimate a cause as this, one ought to be able to get away with one 4 letter word.

What did not seem "legitimate" to Guthrie was the modernist experimentalism of Blackburn's translation: the foreignizing effects deviated too widely from dominant American values in the reception of archaic texts, especially scholarly annotation and a narrowly conceived fluent discourse.

Guthrie's own work with troubadour poetry in the 1920s had assumed the modernist ideal of translation as an independent literary text: he published his translations as poems in their own right, identifying them as translations only in vague footnotes that omitted any precise identification of the Provençal texts. In 1958, however, Guthrie did not recognize Blackburn's pursuit of this same modernist ideal, his emphasis on the literary qualities of the translation at the expense of annotations, which he limited to the Provençal titles and to the vidas and razos that accompanied the texts in manuscripts. Guthrie wanted Blackburn's translation to have a more academic cast, even while acknowledging "the general reader":

There should be a short introduction explaining what, when and where the troubadours were; something of the nature and importance of their work; the formal qualities of their works and the differences between their forms and P.B.'s rendering – also a few words on P.B.'s purpose.

There should also be definitions in the appropriate places (most of which I have marked) of such terms as "alba," "tenson," "sirventes," etc. [...]

A number of poems (see pp. 163, 55, 129) need short introductions badly.

Omitting annotations can of course signal the cultural differences of the foreign texts, insisting on their foreignness with all the discomfort of incomprehension. Most of Blackburn's foreignizing effects, however, were realized in his translations, and since they constituted notable deviations from the prevailing fluent discourse, they definitely looked strange to Guthrie. Thus Blackburn resorted to variant spellings to mimic the absence of standardized orthography and pronunciation in Provençal, but for Guthrie this made the text too resistant to easy readability:

For the reader's convenience, there should be uniformity in spelling proper nouns. It is confusing to the uninitiate to find (often on the same page) Peitau & Poitou, Caersi & Quercy, Talhafer & Tagliaferro (I'd translate it "Iron-Cutter," since it is a nickname); Ventadorn & Ventadour: Marvoill & Mareuil: Amfos & Alfons. Using the modern names of the towns would help the general reader.

Blackburn's use of variant spellings were a means of archaizing the text, signifying its historical remoteness. Guthrie preferred current English usage ("Iron-Cutter"), even the latest cartography.

Guthrie's criticisms went deep to the heart of Blackburn's project. They touched the texts that figured in the oedipal rivalry with Pound: Guthrie's concern with fluency led to the suggestion that Blackburn delete his Pound-inspired version of Bertran de Born's war song. "Maybe I am too harsh," wrote Guthrie, "but from the first line to the last, it seems forced and ineffectual compared with either the original or with E. Pound's Sestina drawn from the same source." When Guthrie reached page 135 in the 187-page manuscript, he scrawled a somewhat exasperated note to Blackburn that criticized his mixed lexicon:

No, look, if you are going to call somebody a burgesa in one line and make the poor inhorantes go looking it up in Levy, you can't have the burgesa's husband getting into a (since 1950) hassle nor somebody doing somebuditch dishonor and smoting him on ye hede in the line after.

It is interesting to note that Guthrie repeatedly set himself up as a spokesperson for the nonspecialist, nonacademic audience ("the uninitiate," "the inhorantes"), but simultaneously made the elitist gesture of excluding popular discourses and dialects, especially working-class colloquialisms. Guthrie's investment in the standard dialect came with a sense of social superiority that surfaced in his comment on another translation, Blackburn's version of Bernart de Ventadorn's Can vei la lauzeta mover. Blackburn's text is typically heterogeneous:

Narcissus at the spring, I kill this human self.

Really, though, without hope, over the ladies;
 never again trust myself to them.

I used to defend them
but now
I'm clearing out, leaving town, quit.
Not one of them helps me against her who destroys and confounds me, fear and disbelieve all of them,
all the same cut.
(Blackburn 1958: 47)

Guthrie thought the colloquialism degraded the foreign text, which he saw as more lofty in tone, more proper in speech, more aristocratic: "This," he wrote, "gets cheap, a sort of Flatbush parody on Bernart." Blackburn's use of "Hell" similarly departed from Guthrie's elite image of the troubadours: "This isn't in accord with Bernart's mood, but maybe it's more modern than 'Alas.'" For Guthrie, marginal translation discourses trashed canonical texts. The English he preferred was the standard dialect; if archaism was used, it needed to be unobtrusive and consistent.

Inevitably Blackburn's more inventive experiments provoked Guthrie to domesticate the translations, revising them for fluency, but also deleting the political satire enabled by the mixed lexicon. When Blackburn edged his version of Bertran de Born closer to contemporary social issues by portraying feudal knights as bourgeois entrepreneurs, "unable to war beyond my own garage / without an underwriter's check" (Blackburn 1958: 125), Guthrie complained about the strange effects produced by the multilingual diction:

Since P.B. uses so many anachronisms on the modern side, why "targe" for "shield." The rime scheme of this sestina aren't [sic] followed in the translation anyway and, being spotty, would be better omitted. But if a rime must be had (and God knows the "targe-garage" is nothing to be awfully happy about), why not "shield-field"? [...] The "garage" part is bad from all angles. If "tarja" must be "targe," why not have Bertran too poor to fight "at large"?

Guthrie seemed willing to recognize Blackburn's attention to prosody: free verse that was "spotty," with the concealed rhymes and semi-submerged alliteration that Pound had recommended for the "cantabile values" of the Provençal text. Yet Guthrie remained unwilling to license Blackburn's heterogeneous discourse. By crossing languages, cultures, historical periods, the "targe"/"garage" rhyme preempts transparency, any illusionistic sense of an authorial voice, and calls attention to the multiple codes that make this an English-language translation, with a cultural political agenda. Guthrie's response shows that Blackburn's translation was in part the casualty of literary values that dominated American culture during the Cold War, in and out of the academy, values that were elitist in their exclusion of marginal cultural discourses and reactionary in their refusal of the democratic politics that animated Blackburn's modernist project.

After the Macmillan episode Blackburn's writing took various developments. Some responded directly to Guthrie's report; most continued his already significant accomplishments as a modernist poet-translator, but in new directions. Blackburn's relationship to the Provençal translation certainly changed. The depth of Guthrie's impact can be gauged from the final version of the translation: Blackburn incorporated some of Guthrie's suggestions – even when these conflicted with his modernist experimentalism. At several points, Blackburn followed Guthrie's insistence on standard English: he used Guthrie's recommended spelling, "night," instead of his initial choice, the subcultural "nite"; he accepted Guthrie's change of "like" to "as" in the colloquialism, "like / they say" (Blackburn 1958: 32; 1986: 46, 47). Here Blackburn was browbeaten by Guthrie's distaste for grammatical improprieties, by his rather ethnocentric assumption that the troubadours should be held to English linguistic norms: "That 'like' for 'as' must have Guilhem twirling in his grave," wrote Guthrie, "It fills me with a creeping horror." Blackburn also abandoned the much criticized "targe"/"garage" rhyme, adopting Guthrie's "shield"/"field" (Blackburn 1986: 164).

Finally, however, Blackburn did not make numerous revisions in the lexicon and syntax of the 1958 versions. Instead he expanded the selection of Provençal translations, including four more satires by Marcabru that required a larger variety of obscenities. He also added annotations that provided some of the information Guthrie requested and sought to answer his objections. In one note Blackburn commented on the variant spellings, revealing the different, somewhat contradictory determinations that shaped his final version: the historicist impulse apparent in his respect for the Provençal manuscripts, but also his concern with the prosody of his translation and even his partial acceptance of Guthrie's call for consistent, modern spelling. Blackburn's note specifically addresses Guthrie's report:

Mareuil (Dordogne): I use the modern French spelling to normalize the place name. In the manuscripts you'll find Maroill, Maruoill, Marueill, Maruelh, Marvoill, Merueil, Meruoill, Miroill, and Miroilh. Some of these may be simply copyists' mistakes, but they also reflect slight differences in pronunciation from area to area. [...] The point I would make here is that neither the pronunciation nor the orthography was particularly standardized. Especially in the poems, I use the version that suits my ear at that point. In the razo here I use Anfos for the king of Aragon: the name is also Amfos, Alfons – I don't remember using the French Alphonse ever.

The publishing history that banished Blackburn's Provençal translations to the margins of American literary culture, available only in small-circulation magazines and limited-edition books, inevitably confined the influence of their striking effects.

These inspired not the work of other translators or translation theorists and critics, but mainly Blackburn's own poetry (Sturgeon 1990). Throughout the 1960s the translations became a field of prosodic experiment for Blackburn: he explored Charles Olson's performance-oriented notion of "projective verse," "in which the poet manages to register both the acquisitions of his ear and the pressures of his breath" (Allen 1960: 393). Olson argued that this prosody followed the modernist abandonment of the pentameter standard ("the experiments of Cummings, Pound, Williams"), but it was uniquely made possible by the typewriter, which, "due to its rigidity and space precisions," could produce a poem "as a script to its vocalization" (ibid.). Blackburn, in his New York Quarterly interview, similarly took the layout of the text as a set of notations for performance: "Punctuation serves much the way that spacing does – that is, to indicate the length of a pause" (Packard 1987: 11).

After the Macmillan episode Blackburn's revisions of the Provençal translations included more attention to their formal qualities – punctuation, line break, spacing. Occasionally the results were dramatic. Blackburn's work on the opening of this text by Marcabru developed the iconic aspect of the prosody, its imitation of the falling leaf:

When the leaf spins
 its staying power
 gone, twists off,
 falls spinning down through the branches from top limbs whence wind has torn it,
 I watch.
 It is a sign.
 The icy storm that's brewing's better than grumbling and meandering summer
 congesting us with hates and whoring.
 (Blackburn 1958: 30)

When the leaf spins
 its staying power
 gone,
 twists off,
 falls spinning down through the branches from top limbs from which the wind has torn it, I watch.

It is a sign.

The icy storm that's brewing's better than grumbling and meandering summer
 congesting us with hates and whoring.

(Blackburn 1986: 43)

In the later version, Blackburn sacrificed the archaism “whence,” but replaced it with a repetitive syntactical turn that is more evocative of the “spinning” leaf (“from top limbs from / which the wind has”). These prosodic experiments culminated in Blackburn’s last poems, The Journals (1967–71), where the autobiographical verse is polyrhythmic – lyrical and angular, conversational and iconic, quietly emotional and parodic – but always inventive, attuned to a reflective music, multicoded:

Seaplane going over, going somewhere . over head, the blue really reflected in this sea.
 (Blackburn 1985: 572)

The end of a distance come so early in the morning
 where the eye stops, flames running O their tongues up thru along the roof-tree of down the coping of that church in Harlem.
 (Ibid.: 555)

The wind blowth snow fallth branches whip in the wind down, rise, forth and back drifts groweth summat
 It's going to take us two days at least to shovel out of this one, off to Buf-falo, o March, after all, Spring cometh .

(Ibid.: 613)

The Journals is essentially an individualistic project, a verse diary of Blackburn’s last years, travelling in Europe and the United States with his wife Joan and son Carlos, suffering through the final stages of his fatal illness, throat cancer. Yet Blackburn's prosodic experiments give all this an anti-individualistic edge by pushing the verse towards greater heterogeneity, using rhythm, punctuation, typography to foreground the textuality and erode the coherence of the speaking voice, now a site of diverse lexicons, cultural codes, social affiliations, whose very juxtaposition invites a mutual questioning.

The Provençal project was also a source of personae and themes for Blackburn's poems, some of which carry on the social criticism he occasionally worked into the lexicon of the translations. His version of Guillem de Poitou's Ab lo dolchor del temps novel—

In the new season when the woods burgeon and birds
sing out the first stave of new song, time then that a man take the softest joy of her who is most to his liking.

(Blackburn 1958: 13)

gets quoted in a poem contemporary to the 1958 manuscript, "Meditation on the BMT":

Here, at the beginning of the new season before the new leaves burgeon, on either side of the Eastern Parkway station near the Botanical Gardens they burn trash on the embankment, laying barer than ever our sad, civilized refuse.

1 coffee can without a lid
1 empty pint of White Star, the label faded by rain
1 empty beer-can
2 empty Schenley bottles
1 empty condom, seen from 1 nearly empty train empty

(Blackburn 1985: 141)

Blackburn's quotation uses the troubadour motif to interrogate consumer capitalism, juxtaposing a lyrical evocation of spring to an itemized list of "trash" visible from a New York subway train. The Provençal idealization of human sexuality as a renewing natural pleasure emphasizes the dirty realism of contemporary sexual practices, which come to seem less "civilized," more emotionally impoverished, even as they suggest that troubadour poetry is itself suspect, a mystification of the material conditions and consequences of sexuality.

6 Alternate forms of modernist translation

Blackburn's experience with the Provençal translation bears on his other translation projects, although with a very different outcome. With the 1958 manuscript unpublished, he turned his attention to Latin American writing, particularly the fiction of the Argentine Julio Cortázar. In 1959 Blackburn entered into a contract with Cortázar that made him the Argentine writer's "exclusive and official literary representative (AGENT) throughout the entire world (except in): France, Germany, Italy and all the Spanish-speaking countries."¹⁰ Blackburn negotiated the publication of the first English-language versions of Cortázar's fiction, which were two novels: The Winners, translated by Elaine Kerrigan in 1965, and Hopscotch, translated by Gregory Rabassa in 1966. Late in the 1950s Blackburn began translating Cortázar's poems and short stories, mostly for magazine publication, and in 1967 the stories were issued as End of the Game. He then translated another collection of Cortázar's short prose pieces, Cronopios and Famas (1969), and was the likely translator for the next volume of Cortázar's stories to appear in English, All Fires the Fire (1973), but his failing health prevented him from taking on this project. Blackburn's work with Cortázar served the modernist cultural politics that informed his Provençal translation and his article "The International Word," a leftwing internationalism that viewed translation as a foreignizing intervention into American culture. The Cortázar translations, however, were much more effective in their dissidence, questioning and actually changing literary canons in English.

Blackburn, among the other translators and publishers of Cortázar's writing, was importing the so-called "boom" in twentieth-century Latin American fiction, a body of foreign literature characterized by experimentalist strategies that challenged the realism dominating British and American narrative. The Latin American boom began circulating in English during the 1950s, when translations of writers like Jorge Luis Borges appeared in magazines and anthologies (see Levine 2005). Among the first book-length translations in this tendency was in fact Borges's Ficciones (1962), rendered by various hands, American and British. A few years later, the reviews of the Cortázar translations repeatedly linked him to "his countryman" Borges, and both were inserted in the modernist mainstream of European fiction: Franz Kafka, Italo Svevo, Günter Grass, Alain Robbe-Grillet, Michel Butor, Nathalie Sarraute.¹¹ Contemporary British and American fiction was for the most part realist at this time, with narrative experimentalism banished to the obscure fringes (Djuna Barnes, Samuel Beckett, Flann O'Brien, William Burroughs, William Gaddis, John Hawkes, Thomas Pynchon) – or to popular forms like horror and science fiction. This is reflected in The New York Times "Best Seller List" for 9 July 1967, the issue in which Blackburn's End of the Game was reviewed. The list contained mostly varieties of realism (historical and contemporary) by such authors as James Jones and Gore Vidal, Elia Kazan and Chaim Potok, Irving Wallace and Louis Auchincloss. The only deviation was a Gothic fantasy: Ira Levin's novel, Rosemary's Baby.

The success of Latin American writers like Borges and Cortázar was both critical and commercial, owing to numerous, mostly favorable reviews, the support of trade publishers like Grove, Pantheon, and New Directions, and publishing subventions issued through the Center for Inter-American Relations, a cultural organization funded by private foundations (Rostagno 1997). The translations were very well received. Rabassa's version of Hopscotch won the 1966 National Book Award for Translation. Within the first six months of publication, The Winners sold 8195 hardback copies; within five months, Hopscotch sold 6965. Both novels were quickly reprinted as paperbacks. Blackburn's End of the Game (1967) received some twenty enthusiastic reviews in the UK and the US, and selections appeared in The New Yorker and Vogue. Within three months of publication, 3159 hardback copies were sold, and during the next few years several stories were frequently anthologized. By 1974 there had been four paperback printings. The paperbacks were published by Macmillan, who retitled the book Blow-Up to capitalize on the publicity from Michelangelo Antonioni's 1967 film, a free adaptation of a Cortázar story.

The cultural intervention that Blackburn failed to make with his Provençal translation came to pass with the Cortázar – in a different genre, in a modern language, and with a contemporary writer. The English-language success of Latin American writing during the 1960s undoubtedly altered the canon of foreign fiction in British and American cultures, not only by introducing new texts and writers, but by validating experimentalist strategies that undermined the assumptions of classic realism, both theoretical (individualism, empiricism) and ideological (liberal humanism). The Latin American boom must also be counted among the cultural tendencies that altered the canon of British and American fiction during the 1960s, the proliferation of diverse narrative experiments inspired by modernism: Donald Barthelme, Christine Brooke-Rose, Angela Carter, Robert Coover, Guy Davenport, among many others. Blackburn's work with Cortázar continued the modernist cultural politics that animated his Provençal translation: he recovered a foreign literature that was currently marginal in British and American cultures, so that it might make a cultural difference in English, interrogating dominant literary values (realism, bourgeois individualism) and influencing the development of new Anglophone literatures.

Blackburn's work with Cortázar produced a foreignizing effect by choosing marginal texts, but in his translating he also made verbal choices that were foreignizing enough to be compellingly strange. The remarkable thing about the translations that supported the canonization of Latin American fiction in English is that they are distinguished by considerable fluency. Blackburn's translations smuggled Cortázar's fiction into British and American cultures by subtly broadening the narrowly conceived fluent discourse that continues to dominate English-language translation, opening up current standard usage to nonstandard forms. Translating fluently, insuring the illusion of transparency and the evocation of a coherent voice, positioning the reader in a particular narrative point of view ultimately heighten Cortázar's modernist experimentation, the formal discontinuities that dislodge the reader from the narrative positioning and encourage a self-consciousness skeptical of the realist illusion. The reviewer for the British magazine Books and Bookmen acknowledged the foreignizing effect of Blackburn's choice of Cortázar, whose "world is a strange one, and to most people, I would think, an unfamiliar one." But the reviewer also felt that the fluency of Blackburn's translation was powerful in delivering this strangeness:

Ignorant of the experience to come, I opened the violet-jacketed copy of Julio Cortázar's short story collection, and found myself on the other side of the Looking Glass in one minute flat. Where to begin on this dazzling book? Perhaps with Paul Blackburn's translation into splendid, flexible English, whose metaphors carry the savage accuracy of a punch in the stomach.

(Stubbs 1968: 26)

The reviewer for The Nation described Blackburn's reliance on current English usage, but also pointed to foreign borrowings in the lexicon, which, the reviewer suggested, would foster innovations in English-language prose:

The translation, by Paul Blackburn, is properly colloquial, elegant and eloquent, and is flavored with just enough touches of Spanish and French phrases to spice the narrative. At this point in the development of a freer form for prose writing, Cortázar is indispensable.

(Stern 1967: 248)

Yet perhaps this passage should read "Blackburn's translation of Cortázar is indispensable" to innovative prose. Under the regime of fluent discourse, which routinely makes the translator invisible, even reviewers who praise the translator by name are likely to reduce the translation to the foreign author. Blackburn's translation is inevitably free at points, departing from "Cortázar," inscribing the Spanish texts with different linguistic and cultural values, enabling them to produce effects that work only in English. A closer look at Blackburn's discursive moves will reveal the effectiveness of his Cortázar translations.

"Continuity of Parks" ("Continuidad de los Parques") is a brief but characteristic text from End of the Game that seamlessly shifts between two realistic narratives, finally provoking a metaphysical uncertainty about which is the text, which reality. A businessman sitting in an armchair at his country estate reads a novel about an unfaithful wife whose lover sets out to kill her husband; when the crime is about to be performed, the victim is revealed to be the businessman sitting in the armchair at the opening. At the climactic end, the novel-reading man who had appeared to be real suddenly becomes a character in that novel, just as the characters suddenly come to appear real in order to end the man's life. Cortázar involves the Spanish-language reader in this conundrum, first, by constructing the businessman as the narrative point of view and then by abruptly shifting to the lovers. The rapid conclusion is a bit jolting, not only because the text ends just before the murder occurs, but because the reader was earlier positioned in the victim's point of view, assuming it to be reality.

Blackburn's fluent translation enables this positioning most obviously by using consistent pronouns. The subject of every sentence at the opening is "he," maintaining the realist distinction between the man's reality and the fictiveness of the novel he is reading, limiting the narrative point of view to the man:

He had begun to read the novel a few days before. He had put it down because of some urgent business conferences, opened it again on his way back to the estate by train; he had permitted himself a slowly growing interest in the plot, in the characterizations. That afternoon, after writing a letter giving his power of attorney and discussing a matter of joint ownership with the manager of his estate, he returned to the book in the tranquillity of his study which looked out upon the park with its oaks. Sprawled in his favorite armchair, its back toward the door – even the possibility of an intrusion would have irritated him, had he thought of it – he let his left hand caress repeatedly the green velvet upholstery and set to reading the final chapters.

(Cortázar 1967: 63)

Blackburn's translation displays all the hallmarks of the prevailing form of fluency – linear syntax, univocal meaning, current standard usage – easily setting up the "he" as the position from which the narrative becomes intelligible, the description true, the setting real. The translation is also quite close to the Spanish text, except for one telling deviation: the parenthetical remark in Blackburn's last sentence revises the Spanish. Cortázar's text reads, "de espaldas a la puerta que lo hubiera molestado como una irritante posibilidad de intrusiones" (in a close version, "with his back to the door which would have annoyed him like an irritating possibility of intrusions"). Blackburn's revision is twofold: on the one hand, the English version leaves implied what is explicitly stated in the Spanish, that the door is a potential source of annoyance; on the other hand, the addition of the aside, "had he thought of it," makes explicit what is implied in the Spanish: to be annoyed the man must think that an intrusion is possible. The effect of the revision is to shift to a different narrative point of view that is at once omniscient and authorial – only another consciousness could have "thought" of the possibility – momentarily identifying the "he" as a character in Cortázar's text, as a fiction conceived by an author, and thereby undermining the realist illusion established in the previous sentences. Blackburn's fluent translation possesses considerable stylistic refinement, present even in this subtle revision, an addition to the Spanish that is very much in tune with Cortázar's narrative technique.

Blackburn's choices show him strengthening the realist illusion when the narrative makes another abrupt, unannounced shift to the description of the novel, positioning the reader in the lovers' point of view, erasing the line between fiction and reality. But then – following the Spanish text closely – he fleetingly redraws that line by using literary terms to describe the novel (“dialogue”/“diálogo,” “pages”/“páginas”) and by making a tacit reference to the reading businessman (“one felt”/“se sentía”):

The woman arrived first, apprehensive; now the lover came in, his face cut by the backlash of a branch. Admirably, she stanchd the blood with her kisses, but he rebuffed her caresses, he had not come to perform again the ceremonies of a secret passion, protected by a world of dry leaves and furtive paths through the forest. The dagger warmed itself against his chest, and underneath liberty pounded, hidden close. A lustful, panting dialogue raced down the pages like a rivulet of snakes, and one felt it had all been decided from eternity.

Again, Blackburn's choices involve suggestive departures. He increases the verisimilitude of the translation by adding more precise detail, like the phrase “through the forest,” which is absent from the Spanish text (in another passage, he similarly adds the phrase “leading in the opposite direction” to “On the path” [ibid.: 65]). At the same time, he exaggerates the melodramatic aspects of the scene: he uses “lustful, panting” to render one Spanish word, “anhelante” (“craving,” “yearning,” “panting”), and chooses “raced” for “corría” (instead of the flatter “ran”). Two other additions to Cortázar's text produce the same exaggerated effect: “unforeseen” in the sentence, “Nothing had been forgotten: alibis, unforeseen hazards, possible mistakes”/“Nada había sido olvidado: cortadas, azares, posibles errores” (Cortázar 1967: 65 and 1964: 10), and “flying” in the sentence, “he turned for a moment to watch her running, her hair loosened and flying”/“él se volvió un instante para verla correr con pelo suelto” (Cortázar 1967: 66 and 1964: 10). Blackburn's melodramatic lexicon reinforces the realist illusion, making the narrative more suspenseful, suturing the reader more tightly into the lovers' position; yet it also situates the narrative in a popular fictional genre, the steamy romance, encouraging the reader to interrogate the realist illusionism that dominates Anglophone fiction – most obviously in bestselling novels. Cortázar's text challenges individualistic cultural forms like realism by suggesting that human subjectivity is not self-originating or self-determining, but constructed in narrative, including popular genres. This and the fact that it is a businessman who turns out to be living a fiction dovetail with the critique of bourgeois values, economic and cultural, that recurs in Blackburn's other writing.

The key moments I have considered in Blackburn's career suggest that his work as a translator responded powerfully to his cultural situation. He followed the modernist innovations that were developed by Pound but marginalized by the regime of fluency in English-language translation. This meant cultivating an extremely heterogeneous discourse (a rich mixture of archaism, colloquialism, quotation, nonstandard punctuation and orthography, and prosodic experiment) that prevented the translation from being taken as the “original” and instead asserted its independence as a literary text in a different language and culture. Blackburn’s experimentalist practices were foreignizing: their challenge to fluency, among other values in contemporary American culture (academic criticism, linguistic elitism, bourgeois propriety, realism, individualism), enabled his translations to signal the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign texts. Yet Blackburn was also appropriating these texts for his own cultural agendas: in the construction of his authorial identity through a rivalry with Pound; in the prosodic and thematic development of his own poetry; and in a dissident political intervention designed to foster a leftwing internationalism during the Cold War, when an American foreign policy of containing ideological opponents led to a domestic surge of nationalism that excluded cultural differences.

Blackburn’s Provençal translation intervened into this situation, but was also constrained by it, caught between the midcentury reaction against modernism, the academic reception of archaic literary texts, and an elitism that marginalized nonstandard dialects and discourses. Even twenty years later, in 1978, when the manuscript was finally published, the reception reflected the continuing marginality of modernist translation. In The New York Times Book Review the academic critic and translator Robert M. Adams acknowledged Blackburn’s development of a translation poetics (“Blackburn was a poet, and he responded to the poetry of his originals”) but faulted his “pronounced stylistic mode (in essence the labored slang of Ezra Pound)” and found George Economou’s editing inadequate on largely scholarly grounds: “historical and biographical information is sparse and uncommonly confused in its presentation”; “there is never any indication in the text of where a footnote occurs” (Adams 1979: 36).

Blackburn’s own response after the Macmillan episode was to develop translation projects that continued to serve a modernist cultural politics, although with different foreign literatures and different translation discourses. As Cortázar’s agent and translator, Blackburn worked to get Latin American fiction admitted to the canon of foreign literatures in English. And to achieve this canon reformation, he, like many other English-language translators, resorted to a broader form of fluency, admitting some nonstandard lexical items like colloquialisms while assimilating marginal experimental narratives to the illusionistic effect of transparency that distinguished the dominant realism. Blackburn’s career as a modernist poet-translator shows that the significance of translation practices is always historically contingent: such practices can be defined as “foreignizing” or “domesticating,” “dissident” or “conservative,” only in relation to specific cultural situations, specific moments in the changing reception of foreign literatures and in the changing hierarchy of values in the receiving culture.

Hence it will be illuminating to sketch the trajectory of modernist translation in the United States during the last few decades of the twentieth century. This period is noteworthy for several significant changes. American poets in general translated considerably less, regardless of their poetics, although given the importance of translation to modernism earlier in the century the decrease in the sheer volume of published translations is perhaps most noticeable among experimentalists. The poets loosely associated with “L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E,” the movement named after Charles Bernstein’s and Bruce Andrews’s short-lived but influential magazine (1978–82), are widely regarded as the latest development in the Anglophone modernist tradition (see Messerli 1987; Perloff 1985; Bartlett 1986). Yet translation has not been central to their methods of composition, as it was with previous generations of modernist poets, and only two, Bernstein and Lyn Hejinian, have produced English-language versions of foreign poetry (see Cadiot 1990; Dragomoshchenko 1990, 1993).

The modernist writers who did translate during the period in question tended to neglect archaic texts and focus on foreign writing that is recognizably modernist in form and theme. The interest in classical and medieval literatures shown by Pound and H.D., the Zukofskys and Blackburn can be perceived only in isolated projects – for example, Guy Davenport’s colloquializing versions of Greek lyric poets (1964, 1965, and 1980, collected in 1995) or David Melnick’s queer homophonic version of the Iliad, entitled Men in Aida (1983). By far the greatest number of translations executed by modernists took as their object a twentieth-century writer or body of writing distinguished by a strong experimental tendency. Among the most remarkable achievements are Rosmarie Waldrop’s translations of Edmond Jabès’s philosophical texts starting with The Book of Questions (1976), Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith’s collection of the surrealist Aimé Césaire’s poetry (1983), Eliot Weinberger’s version of Vicente Huidobro’s inventive book-length poem Altazor (1988), and Jerome Rothenberg and Pierre Joris’s selection from the poetry, prose, and performance pieces of the visual artist Kurt Schwitters (1993). These translations were issued by university as well as small presses, indicating that modernist practices, although still not in the mainstream of American literary culture, had gained a degree of acceptability that they lacked during the 1950s and 1960s.

The narrowing of the translators’ focus to foreign modernist writing coincided with a narrowing of the ideological force of the translations. As the Cold War waned, the internationalism that informed the work of a poet-translator like Blackburn was replaced by greater attention to cultural political agendas within the United States. Unlike their modernist predecessors, furthermore, the translators avoided making large claims for their projects or even examining in any detail the cultural and social effects of their translation practices.

Consider Eshleman and Smith’s version of Césaire’s poetry. It was not the poet Eshleman but Smith, professor of French at the California Institute of Technology, who was “primarily responsible” (Eshleman 2000: xx) for the introductory material, which concentrated on Césaire’s writing in the context of French literary traditions and described the translators’ treatment of the linguistic problems posed by Césaire’s texts. Any political analysis was restricted to two aspects of Césaire’s career: his relation to “negritude,” the cultural movement initiated by black Francophone writers in opposition to French colonization as well as racist oppression generally, and his actions as a political official in his native Martinique, still under French control. No attention was paid to the cultural politics of the translation itself.

At one point, however, the translators presented Césaire's poetry as "part of the reorganization of identity in the twentieth century" (Césaire 1983: 17), whereby they provided an implicit political rationale for their decision to translate it. They linked Césaire's surrealism to the American poet Robert Duncan's utopian vision of "a symposium of the whole," which first appeared in Eshleman's magazine Caterpillar: Duncan wrote that

All the old excluded order must be included. The female, the proletariat, the foreign, the animal and vegetative, the unconscious and the unknown, the criminal and failure – all that has been outcast and vagabond must return to be admitted in the creation of what we consider we are.

(Duncan 1967: 7)

To translate the Martinican poet, then, was a foreignizing move, an effort to open the canon of foreign poetries in English to what was then marginal, namely the racially oppressed and the colonized, and therefore to reconfigure Anglophone cultural identities on the basis of a different sort of modernism, European but Africanist, Césaire's surrealist negritude. Yet when Eshleman later recalled the motive for his first translations of Césaire's poetry, Duncan's notion of an "identification with the universe" (ibid.) was reduced, taking the form of a much more local application:

In 1977, I received a California Arts Council "Artists in the Community" grant which involved my teaching poetry for a school year in the predominantly African-American Manual Arts High School in south-central Los Angeles. I got the idea of translating Césaire's Notebook of a Return to the Native Land while teaching at Manual Arts and presenting the translation to my students at the end of the year.

(Eshleman 2000: 106)

Eshleman offered no explanation of what he hoped to achieve with his "idea." All the same, his and Smith's reading of the poem as Césaire's reformation of his racial identity ("a parthenogenesis in which Césaire must conceive and give birth to himself while exorcising his introjected and collective white image of the black" [Césaire 1983: 21]) suggests that Eshleman expected a translation to provoke a similar reformation in his African-American students – despite the difficulties they would face in reading an experimental text. Instead of situating the translation in an international framework, let alone Duncan's utopianism, Eshleman seems to have imagined an intervention into American racial politics.

This agenda can be glimpsed in Eshleman and Smith's interpretive moves as translators, evidently reflecting his "primary responsibility for the final American version of the text” (Eshleman 2000: xx). In Notebook of a Return to the Native Land their choices inscribe a veritable history of American racial relations from slavery to the Civil Rights movement in the 1950s to Black Power in the late 1960s. They render “flic” (“cop”) as “pig;” “droits civiques” (“civic rights”) as “civil rights;” and “Je dis hurrah!” (“I say hurrah!”) as “I say right on!” (Césaire 1983: 35, 63, 79; OED). This distinctly American discourse becomes more pronounced as Césaire’s poem turns caustically ironic:

Il n’y a pas a dire: c’était un bon nègre. Les Blancs disent que c’était un bon nègre, un vrai bon nègre, le bon nègre à son bon maître. Je dis hurrah!

No question about it: he was a good nigger. The Whites say he was a good nigger. A really good nigger, massa’s ole darky. I say right on!

(Ibid.: 78–9)

The translators’ inscription implicitly draws an analogy between two oppositional movements, negritude and Black Power. Yet the analogy also establishes an abusive fidelity to Césaire’s text and thereby sets going a critical dialectic that exposes the limitations of both movements: the militancy that accompanied the call for economic and political autonomy in Black Power, embodied in such organizations as the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense, highlights the more personal scope of Césaire’s identity reformation in the poem (it concludes with the poet following the “Dove” of “brotherhood” and seeking “the malevolent tongue of the night” [ibid.: 85]) while Césaire’s subsequent election to political office highlights the lack of a viable political institutionalization for Black Power (Van Deburg 1992).

Eshleman’s elliptical remarks do not make clear the extent to which he is aware of the ideological implications of the translation. Like most poet-translators during the century, he preferred the belletristic statement to the theoretical or critical commentary. He defined “the basic challenge” of translating Césaire as “do[ing] two incompatible things at once: an accurate translation and one that is up to the performance level of the original,” joining a new scholarly concern with linguistic precision to the typically modernist interest in the aesthetic independence of the translated text (Eshleman 2000: 117). For the most part, Eshleman and Smith’s translation does adhere closely to Césaire’s French, displaying a brilliant resourcefulness in devising equivalents for his stylistic peculiarities, especially his extensive use of Caribbean plant names and his complicated, discontinuous syntax (Césaire 1983: 24–8). Nonetheless, the translators varied current standard English in ways that recall previous modernist practices, resorting to colloquialisms, obscenities, jargons, neologisms, and foreign loan words, occasionally at points where the French is standard usage (Olds 1984: 15). For example, they rendered “s’enliser” (“sinks”) as “quicksands” (a verb), “courir” (“to run”) as “gad about;” “inquiétudes” (“worries”) as “jitters;” “ordure” (“garbage”) as “muck;” and “boniment” (“lie;” “tall tale”) as “bullshit” (ibid.: 39, 43, 65). The linguistic heterogeneity of the translation stages a modernist resistance against the fluent strategies that continued to dominate English-language poetry translation, undermining any illusion of transparency. But the departures from Césaire's French bear some resemblance to Eshleman's own writing, particularly his fondness for surreal imagery and neologisms, casting doubt on his notion of accuracy. "All the poets I have spent long periods of translation time with," Eshleman has observed, "have drawn me because I felt that their poetry knew something that my poetry wanted to know" (Eshleman 1989: 230). This sort of attraction ultimately blurs the distinction between submitting to the influence of a foreign poetry and assimilating that poetry to a poetic practice in the translating language.

At the end of the twentieth century, the most urgent question raised by American modernist translation was in fact whether the search for foreign writing did not devolve into a self-confirming form of appropriation. The modernist project of being different at home, of challenging dominant linguistic and literary values in the receiving culture, seems to have limited the American translator's openness to the linguistic and cultural differences that had been so important to early modernism, but that had amounted to more than locating another modernist experiment, another stylistic innovation, in a foreign literature. End-of-the-century modernist poets used translation to advance their agenda, opposing "the primacy of the individual voice" that Bernstein has treated as the hallmark of "official verse culture" as well as the illusion of transparency so prized in that culture (Bernstein 1992: 2, 6). Yet this aim weakened the impact of any foreignizing effects that the translations may have produced by confining them to modernist foreign poetries that were recognizable as such and hence assimilable to Anglophone modernism. The very practice of translation, if driven by the pursuit of the foreign, demands a constant rethinking of experimentalism so that foreign poetic traditions without a strong modernist tendency do not fall victim to a new exclusion.

Simpatico

How many people today live in a language that is not their own? Or no longer, or not yet, even know their own and know poorly the major language that they are forced to serve? This is the problem of immigrants, and especially of their children, the problem of minorities, the problem of a minor literature, but also a problem for all of us: how to tear a minor literature away from its own language, allowing it to challenge the language and making it follow a sober revolutionary path? How to become a nomad and an immigrant and a gypsy in relation to one's own language?

Gilles Deleuze and Felix Guattari (tr. Dana Polan)

In 1978, soon after my translations of Italian poetry began appearing in magazines, I met another American translator of Italian, an older, widely published, and very gifted writer who commented on some of my work and gave me advice about literary translation. Among his many shrewd remarks was the recommendation that I translate an Italian author of my own generation, something which he himself had been doing for many years and with much success. He explained that when author and translator live in the same historical moment, they are more likely to share a common sensibility, and this is highly desirable in translation because it increases the fidelity of the translated text to the original. The translator works better when he and the author are simpatico, said my friend, and by this he meant not just “agreeable,” or “congenial,” meanings which this Italian word is often used to signify, but also “possessing an underlying sympathy.” The translator should not merely get along with the author, not merely find him likeable; there should also be an identity between them.

The ideal situation occurs, my friend believed, when the translator discovers his author at the start of both their careers. In this instance, the translator can closely follow the author's progress, accumulating exhaustive knowledge of the foreign texts, strengthening and developing the affinity which he already feels with his author's ideas and tastes, becoming, in effect, of the same mind. When simpatico is present, the translation process can be seen as a veritable recapitulation of the creative process by which the original came into existence; and when the translator is assumed to participate vicariously in the author's thoughts and feelings, the translated text is read as the transparent expression of authorial psychology or meaning. The voice that the reader hears in any translation made on the basis of simpatico is always recognized as the author's, never as a translator's, nor even as some hybrid of the two.

My friend's ideas about translation still prevail today in British and American cultures, although they have dominated English-language translation at least since the seventeenth century. The earl of Roscommon's Essay on Translated Verse (1684) recommended that the translator chuse an Author as you chuse a Friend:

United by this Sympathetick Bond,
You grow Familiar Intimate, and Fond;
Your Thoughts, your Words, your Stiles, your Souls agree,
No longer his Interpreter, but He.

(Steiner 1975: 77)

Alexander Tytler's Essay on the Principles of Translation (1798) asserted that if the translator's aim is fluency, "he must adopt the very soul of his author" (Tytler 1978: 212). John Stuart Blackie's article on the Victorian translation controversy, "Homer and his translators" (1861), argued that "the successful translator of a poet must not only be a poet himself, but he must be a poet of the same class, and of a kindred inspiration," "led by a sure instinct to recognise the author who is kindred to himself in taste and spirit, and whom he therefore has a special vocation to translate" (Blackie 1861: 269, 271). Burton Raffel's review of the Zukofskys' modernist Catullus argued that the optimal conditions for translating the Latin texts include "(a) a poet, (b) an ability to identify with, to almost be Catullus over a protracted period, and (c) great good luck" (Raffel 1969: 444). And Will Stone, who has translated the poetry of Gérard de Nerval and Georg Trakl, reiterated the point while revealing the anti-intellectualism to which it leads: "Like the act of poetry itself," he asserted, "translation is essentially an intuitive private act of empathy, and despite the energies of theorists seems to nudge any analytical conclusion towards complacency" (Stone 2004: 62).

From this chorus of theorists, critics, and translators it seems clear that the idea of simpatico translation is consistent with ideas about poetry that prevail today in British and American cultures, although they too were formulated centuries ago, perhaps most decisively with the emergence of romanticism in England. From William Wordsworth to T. S. Eliot to Robert Lowell and beyond, the dominant aesthetic in English-language poetry has been transparency, the view, as Antony Easthope neatly puts it in his incisive critique, that "poetry expresses experience; experience gives access to personality, and so poetry leads us to personality" (Easthope 1983: 4–5). My friend's notion of simpatico was in fact a development of these assumptions to characterize the practice of translation (it was transparent) and to define the role of the translator (identification with the foreign author's personality).

I was profoundly attracted by my friend's remarks. No doubt this attraction was partly due to his cultural authority, his command of publishers and his growing list of awards, the sheer success he had achieved with his translations. But he also offered a sophisticated and rather lyrical understanding of what I wanted to do, a position of identification for me as translator, someone I could be when translating – that is, my successful friend, but also, in the process, the author of a foreign text. I followed this advice, and as chance would have it I came upon an Italian writer who is roughly my own age, the Milanese poet Milo De Angelis.

Born in 1951, De Angelis made his precocious debut in 1975, when he was invited to contribute some of his poems to L'almanacco dello Specchio, a prestigious annual magazine published by one of Italy's largest commercial presses, Arnoldo Mondadori Editore. The title of the anthology, literally "The Almanac of the Mirror," asserts its claim to be a representative literary survey, but the title also connects it with Mondadori's longstanding series of poetry volumes, called Lo Specchio, whose editorial policies the anthology seems to share: both print recent work by canonized contemporary writers, foreign and Italian, along with a few newcomers. The issue of L'almanacco to which De Angelis contributed also included poems by Eugenio Montale and Pier Paolo Pasolini, as well as Italian translations from the poetry of various foreign writers, Russian (Marina Tsvetayeva), German (Paul Celan), and American (Robert Bly). De Angelis's first book of poems, called Somiglianze ("Resemblances"), appeared in 1976 from the small commercial press Guanda, noted in the 1970s for its list of innovative contemporary writing. These two titles, the assertive mirror and the tentative resemblances, raised a range of questions about the possibility of simpatico translation, questions about representation, canon formation, and literary publishing, which came to haunt my encounter with De Angelis's poetry over the next twenty years.

I The canon of modern Italian poetry in English

As I followed De Angelis's success in Italy, I quickly saw that he couldn't match it in the US and the UK, not in the 1970s or today. The canon of twentieth-century Italian poetry in English translation hasn't yet admitted his kind of writing, doesn't find it simpatico, and in fact constrained my attempts to publish my translations. At the center of this canon is Eugenio Montale (1896–1981), flanked by many other Italian poets who exhibit a stylistic affinity with his poetry or who received his admiration in essays and reviews and, in some cases, his recommendation to publishers. At the margins are the successive waves of experimentalism that swept through Italian poetry in the post-World War II period and gave rise to poets like De Angelis. Montale's canonical status in British and American poetry translation, I learned, cast a shadow of neglect over the legions of Italian poets who followed him.

English translation of Montale's poetry began early, with a 1928 appearance in Eliot's Criterion, and it has continued to this day in myriad magazines and anthologies. It was only in the late 1950s, however, that book-length translations started to proliferate, so that Montale now rivals Dante in the number of versions by different hands to be found on publishers' lists. Montale produced eight slim volumes of poetry, all of which have been Englished in their entirety or in part, some of them more than once.¹ Individual sequences of poems have frequently been lifted out of these volumes and published as chapbooks. There have been eight representative selections, an extensively annotated single-volume collection of his first three books, an anthology presenting multiple versions of individual poems, a book of autobiographical prose, a slim miscellany of critical prose, and a large selection of essays (some 350 pages). At present, fifteen English-language translations of Montale's writing are in print. They are published by an impressively broad range of trade, academic, and small presses in the US, UK, and Canada: Bloodaxe, Boyars, Farrar, Straus & Giroux, Graywolf, Mosaic, New Directions, Norton, Oberlin, Other, Penguin, and Turtle Point. And the numerous translators include talented poets, scholars, and editors, some of whom are internationally known: William Arrowsmith, Jonathan Galassi, Dana Gioia, Jeremy Reed, G. Singh, Charles Wright, and David Young. Italian poets linked to Montale by resemblance or influence, whether formal or thematic, have also appeared in a number of book-length translations since the late 1950s: they include Guido Gozzano (1883–1916), Umberto Saba (1883–1957), Giuseppe Ungaretti (1888–1970), Salvatore Quasimodo (1901–68), Lucio Piccolo (1903–69), Sandro Penna (1906–76), Leonardo Sinisgalli (1908–81), Vittorio Sereni (1913–83), Mario Luzi (1914–2005), and Maria Luisa Spaziani (1924–). Here too the presses are varied and the translators accomplished. The presses include Anvil, Carcanet, Chicago, Cornell, Farrar, Straus & Giroux, Green Integer, Guernica, Hamish Hamilton, Minerva, New Directions, Ohio State, Princeton, Red Hill, Sheep Meadow; among the translators are Jack Bevan, Patrick Creagh, W. S. Di Piero, Ruth Feldman and Brian Swann, Andrew Frisardi, Allen Mandelbaum, J. G. Nichols, Michael Palma, Peter Robinson and Marcus Perryman, Stephen Sartarelli, and Paul Vangelisti. Seventeen books by poets who can be described, without too much violence, as Montale avatars in English are currently in print, a couple with essays by him.²

Compared to the increasing interest that distinguished Montale's reception in British and American cultures, other tendencies in Italian poetry have received limited attention. Among them, experimentalism is remarkably underrepresented, given its importance in Italy. In a conservative estimate, approximately fifty poets writing over five decades can be classed in this category, making it a central movement in Italian poetry since the World War II. The first wave, sometimes called "I novissimi" ("The Newest") after the title of an important 1961 anthology, includes its editor Alfredo Giuliani (1924–), Corrado Costa (1929–91), Edoardo Sanguineti (1930–), Giulia Niccolai (1934–), Nanni Balestrini (1935–), Antonio Porta (1935–89), Franco Beltrametti (1937–95), and Adriano Spatola (1941–89). The second wave, which began publishing during the 1970s, includes Nanni

Cagnone (1939–), Gregorio Scalise (1939–), Luigi Ballerini (1940–), Angelo Lumelli (1944–), Giuseppe Conte (1945–), Cesare Viviani (1947–), Michelangelo Coviello (1950–), and Milo De Angelis. There are also various other poets whose careers do not coincide with these chronologies, but whose writing is marked by a strong experimental impulse – Andrea Zanzotto (1921–), for instance, and Amelia Rosselli (1930–96). The fact that these names are more than likely to be meaningless to most Anglophone readers of poetry is symptomatic of the poets' current marginality (and perhaps that of any other Italian poet but Dante and Montale) in British and American writing.

English translations of the experimental poetry took much longer to appear (over a decade after the Italian publication) than English versions of Montale's poems (within three years of his first volume). In the 1970s, Ruth Feldman and Brian Swann did a selected Zanzotto with Princeton, and Paul Vangelisti published his chapbook version of Spatola's Majakovskiiiiij with John McBride's Los Angeles-based Red Hill Press. Vangelisti and McBride built a small library of Italian experimentalism, with nine books from Beltrametti, Costa, Niccolai, Porta, and Spatola, as well as an anthology that aims to map the movement, Italian Poetry, 1960–1980: From Neo to Post Avant-garde (1982). Porta has been the most translated: six books of poetry altogether, including individual volumes from City Lights and Green Integer and a selected from the Canadian press Guernica. The poet Ballerini's Out of London Press issued bilingual volumes of Cagnone, Tomaso Kemeny, and Giovanna Sandri, as well as an anthology that collected essays, lectures, and poems from a conference held in New York during the late 1970s, Thomas Harrison's The Favorite Malice (1983). Poets associated with the experimentalism, as well as various other contemporary tendencies, are represented in several other anthologies from these years – but they are entirely absent from William Jay Smith and Dana Gioia's Poems from Italy (1985), which aims to be a representative survey of Italian poetry from its medieval beginnings. Jamie McKendrick's anthology carries a similarly comprehensive title, The Faber Book of 20th Century Italian Poems (2004), but experimental poets are reduced to a small and misleading sample, a handful of poems by Zanzotto, Sanguineti, and Rosselli, compared to the substantial selection from Montale and his avatars. In 1995 a translation of Giuliani's anthology, I novissimi, was finally brought out by Sun & Moon, more than thirty years after its Italian publication; in 2004 the first book-length translation of Rosselli's poetry, War Variations, was published by Green Integer, almost ten years after her death.

By the 1990s, roughly twenty English-language books relating in whole or part to the experimentalist movement had been published, mostly by rather obscure small presses with limited distribution. In the following decade, a few new books in this vein appeared as older ones went out of print, but their marginal situation has remained unchanged. It is no exaggeration to say that you will have trouble if you want to locate them, even through an online bookseller; many university libraries have not acquired them. But you will certainly be able to find most of Montale's books. Behind Montale's monumentalization in British and American writing lies a very different poetic landscape in Italy, one where he is canonized, to be sure, but which also includes the canonical tendency I am calling, somewhat reductively, “experimentalism.”

No doubt, the different reception of these Italian poetries is due to many factors, cultural, economic, ideological. The fact that Montale was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1975 accounts for some of his cultural capital here and abroad. But it can't explain the sustained attention given to his poetry by the English-language writers who have chosen to translate it, or the relative neglect bestowed on some fifty years of experimentalism. To understand this, I want to suggest, we must turn to the dominant poetics in British and American cultures, specifically its romantic assumptions: that the poet is a unified subjectivity freely expressing his personal experience, and that the poem should therefore be centered on the poetic I, evoking a unique voice, communicating the poet's self in transparent language, sustaining a feeling of simpatico in the translator. Montale's canonical status in British and American writing rests on his translators' assimilation of his poetry to mainstream poetics, whereas the postwar experimentalism has been marginalized largely because it resists any such assimilation. The Montale canonized in English is actually a domesticated version shaped by a poet-oriented aesthetic and realized in the transparent discourse of fluent translation.

A case in point is Dana Gioia's version of Montale's Mottetti, a consecutively numbered sequence of twenty poems that forms the centerpiece of the 1939 volume Le occasioni. Montale's contemporaries found these poems obscure, using the term “hermeticism” (ermetismo) to disparage their typically modernist poetics of indirection, their recourse to ellipsis, fragmentation, heterogeneity. In an essay from 1950, “Due sciaccalli al guinzaglio” (“Two Jackals on a Leash”), Montale answered his critics by claiming that the “motets” were not obscure, that although individual poems were written at various times, they constituted “an entirely unmysterious little autobiographical novel,” in which he deployed some traditional cultural materials – Dante's La Vita Nuova, the dolce stilnovisti – to represent his intermittent relationship with Irma Brandeis, an American Dante scholar he encountered in Florence (Montale 1982: 305). British and American mainstream poetics privileges the poet, so Gioia accepts Montale's defensive, slyly ironic essay at face value and asserts that the poems “form, a unified sequence whose full meaning and power becomes apparent only when they are read together” (Montale 1990: 11). Any obscurity is only apparent, an effect of the equally apparent discontinuity of the narrative:

The sequence recreates isolated moments of insight, stripped of their nonessential elements. Everything else in the story is told by implication, and the reader must participate in the reconstruction of the human drama by projecting his or her own private associations to fill in the missing elements of the narrative.

(Ibid.: 16; my italics)

It is remarkable how Gioia repeatedly locates the formal elements that earned Montale the tag “hermetic” – only to explain away their existence, to “fill in” the cracks of the broken text. In Gioia’s assimilation of Montale to mainstream poetics, the most important thing is to maintain the continuity of the poet’s representation of his experience, insuring the coherence of the poetic subject and its control over the act of self-expression. Hence Gioia’s translation strategy is designed to make versions that “would move naturally as English-language poems,” “always preferring the emotional clarity and narrative integrity of the whole poem in English to the lexicographical fidelity of the individual word,” departing from Montale’s lineation so as to “integrate the transposed elements tightly into a new whole” (ibid.: 21). The departures, however, are not seen as inaccuracies or domesticating revisions, but as more intimate fidelities, showing that Gioia is really simpatico with Montale, “faithful not only to the sense but also to the spirit of the Italian” (ibid.: 22). Here it becomes clear that the translator’s feeling of simpatico is no more than a projection, that the object of the translator’s identification is ultimately himself, the “private associations” he inscribes in the foreign text in the hope of producing a similarly narcissistic experience in the English-language reader.

The effect of mainstream poetics on Gioia’s translations can be seen in his version of the sixth Italian text in the group:

La speranza di pure rivederti m’abbandonava;
 e mi chiesi se questo che mi chiude ogni senso di te, schermo d’immagini, ha i segni della morte o dal passato è in esso, ma distorto e fatto labile, un tuo barbaglio:
 (a Modena, tra i portici, un servo gallonato trascinava due sciacalli al guinzaglio).
 (Montale 1984a: 144)

I had almost lost hope of ever seeing you again;
 and I asked myself if this thing cutting me off from every trace of you, this screen of images,
 was the approach of death, or truly some dazzling vision of you out of the past,

bleached, distorted,
fading:

(under the arches at Modena
I saw an old man in a uniform dragging two jackals on a leash).
(Montale 1990: 35)

Gioia's version appreciably enlarges the poet's presence in the poem with several alterations and additions. Montale's opening lines – "La speranza di pure rivederti / m'abbandonava" (in a rendering that follows the Italian word order and lineation, "The hope of ever seeing you again / was abandoning me") – get reversed, with the emphasis shifted to Gioia's "I": "I had almost lost." Similarly, the penultimate line contains another first-person reference, "I saw," which doesn't appear at all in the Italian text. Gioia's other additions – "truly," "vision," "bleached," "old man" – show an effort to make the language more emotive or dramatic, to sketch the psychological contours of the poetic subject, but they come off as somewhat stagy, even sentimental ("old man"). In keeping with this emotionalizing of Montale's lexicon, Gioia uses the phrase "approach of death" to translate "i segni della morte" ("signs of death"), diminishing the element of self-reflexivity in the Italian, its awareness of its own status as "images" and "signs," and replacing it with a pallid sensationalism. The English word "signs" is currently loaded with various meanings, including a reference to controversial foreign imports in British and American literary theory that depersonalize the text and deconstruct authorship – viz. semiotics and poststructuralism. The avoidance of the word here produces two notable effects: it moves the translation away from contemporary European thinking that would question the theoretical assumptions of mainstream poetics, and it reinforces the focus on the poet's emotional state, on the (re)presentation of Montale's poem as (Montale's or Gioia's?) self-expression. Gioia's translation strategy quite clearly seeks to efface Montale's modernist poetic discourse, to remove the formal elements that made the Italian text so strikingly different to its first Italian audience, and that, if a translator tried to reproduce them in English, would result in a translation just as striking to an anglophone reader because of their deviation from the dominant poet-centered aesthetic.

The Italian postwar experimentalism proves recalcitrant to this assimilationist ideology in both form and theme. In its early phase, it was called the "neoavantgarde" for its return to modernist movements like Futurism, Dadaism, and Surrealism in order to develop a highly discontinuous poetic discourse that reflected on its cultural and social situation. In the preface to I novissimi, Giuliani outlined the experimental project as a leftwing cultural politics: language is fractured in a "schizomorphic vision" ("visione schizomorfa") which simultaneously registers and resists the mental dislocations and illusory representations of consumer capitalism (Giuliani 1961: xviii). Sanguineti's poetry, to take one example, is a frenetic stream of episodes in the poet's life, allusions to contemporary figures and events, excerpts and applications of his readings in philosophy, literature, psychology, and social theory, punctuated with found language and references to popular culture. The experimentalism in this initial phase circulated widely in magazines and anthologies, a book series with a large trade press (Feltrinelli), and several public meetings that received substantial media attention. And the experiments took varied forms, not only writing that was much more plurivocal and heterogeneous than anything produced by Montale, but also visual poetry and collage, computer-generated texts and performance (see Picchione 2004).

Experimentalism encompasses diverse poetics, and my periodizations and cultural genealogies inevitably give too neat an account (which, moreover, is interested on this occasion, pitched to demonstrate a deviation from Montale). The common experimental thread is the use of formal discontinuity to address philosophical problems raised by language, representation, and subjectivity, resembling in this such contemporary French developments as the nouveau roman and the emergence of poststructuralist thinking, especially in politicized versions, with the Tel Quel group. Indeed, the immense importance of politics to the neo-avant-garde has led Christopher Wagstaff to suggest that "when, in 1968, Italy seemed to offer significant opportunities for direct political action," the movement "saw its raison d'être disappear," as evidenced by the demise of a central magazine, the increasing affiliations with established cultural and academic institutions, and, most tellingly, a theoretical and practical redirection (Wagstaff 1984: 37).

The second experimentalist phase avoided explicit political engagement to develop more speculative projects with distinct philosophical roots (existential phenomenology, psychoanalysis, poststructuralism), exploring the conditions of human consciousness and action in powerfully indeterminate texts. The renewed emphasis on textuality was sometimes given a political inflection in theoretical statements, particularly by members of the first experimentalist phase. In an anthology that surveys Italian poetry during the 1970s, Porta argued that "the reaffirmation of the linguistic force of the I resolves the problem of the interactions between poetry and society, between poetry and reality, because the poetic I is never merely 'personal' but, just like the author, is a linguistic-collective event" (Porta 1979: 27). In general, however, the post-1968 experimentalism didn't resort to the leftwing theorizations of the neo-avant-garde, but rather pursued the "enamored word," as the title of one important anthology indicates, turning it into a site of uncontrollable polysemy, exposing and destabilizing the multiple determinations of subjectivity – linguistic, cultural, social (Pontiggia and DiMauro 1978). In doing this, some poets returned to the formal and thematic innovations of hermeticism, its oblique means of signification, its penchant for climactic moments. This is clear in Milo De Angelis's case: drawing not merely on hermeticism, but on such other European poets as René Char and Paul Celan, he pushes modernist fragmentation to an extreme that threatens intelligibility even while proliferating meaning.

Perhaps a poem by De Angelis, “Lettera da Vignole” (“Letter from Vignole”), can indicate how he at once resembles and differs from the early Montale. It too issues from a friendship between the poet and a woman engaged in literary activity, although not a Dantista. This is Marta Bertamini, who collaborated with De Angelis on the experimentalist magazine he founded, niebo (1977–84), and on a translation from the Latin (Claudian, The Rape of Proserpine). Vignole is the Italian town near the Austrian border where she was born.

Udimmo la pioggia e quelli che ritornavano: ogni cosa nella calma di parlare
e poi la montagna, un attimo, e tutti
i morti che neanche il tuo esilio potrà distinguere.

“Torna subito o non tornare più.”

Era questa – tra i salmi della legge – la voce che hai ripetuto all’inizio, la potente sillaba, prima di te stessa.

“Solo così ti verrò incontro, ignara nell’inverno che ho perduto e che trovo.”
(De Angelis 1985: 12)

We heard the rain and those who were returning: each thing in the calm of speaking and then the mountain, an instant, and all the dead whom not even your exile can distinguish.

“Come back at once or don’t ever come back.”

This – amid the psalms of the law – was the voice that you repeated at the beginning, the potent syllable, before you yourself.

“Only then shall I come to meet you, unaware in the winter which I lost and find.”
(De Angelis 1995: 91)

Knowing the allusion in the title doesn't much help to fix the meaning of this poem. The pronouns support multiple subjectivities. A word like "inverno" ("winter") sets up a fertile intertextual/intersubjective chain: it suggests a key motif in several poets, notably Celan and Franco Fortini (1917–94), an Italian writer of politically engaged cultural criticism and verse who early expressed his admiration of De Angelis. Although De Angelis frequently takes specific episodes in his own life as points of departure, his experimental poetics renders them both impersonal and interpersonal, thickening the representation with an intricate network of images and allusions that construct relations to other poetic discourses, other poetic subjects, challenging any facile reduction of the text to autobiography (whether the poet's or the reader's).

Montale is undoubtedly much easier for British and American mainstream poetics to kidnap than experimentalism. In fact, it could be said that some English-language translators are responding to the traces of another poet-oriented aesthetic in Montale, "crepuscolarismo," a fin de siècle movement ("crepuscolare" means "twilight") that cultivated a private voice in conversational language, producing introspective, slightly ironic musings on prosaic experiences (Sanguineti 1963). This would go some way towards explaining not only Gioia's effacement of Montale's modernism, but the recent American fascination with later Italian poets who seem to be returning to crepuscularism – Valerio Magrelli (1957–), for instance, whom Gioia has also championed and translated (Cherchi and Parisi 1989).

Of course, not all of Montale's English-language translators put to work an assimilationist ideology. William Arrowsmith's versions were designed precisely to respect the modernist edge of poems like Mottetti. In the "Translator's Preface" to The Occasions, Arrowsmith described his practice as "resisting" any domestication of the Italian texts:

I have conscientiously resisted the translator's temptation to fill in or otherwise modify Montale's constant ellipses, to accommodate my reader by providing smoother transitions. And I have done my best to honor Montale's reticence, his ironic qualifications, and evaded cadences. A chief aim has been to preserve the openness of the poet's Italian, even though this has meant resisting the genius of English for concreteness.

(Montale 1987: xxi)

Arrowsmith's intention, however, was to validate, not reevaluate, Montale's canonical status in British and American poetry translation, and so there was no need for him to mention the postwar Italian experimentalism, let alone suggest that it was worth translating into English. Indeed, he believed that vein in terms of a sensibility that belongs so passionately to its own time and strives tenaciously to find an individual voice – a voice never to be repeated. (Ibid.: xx)

The modernist translation discourse Arrowsmith recommended may have been resistant to certain British and American literary values (“smoother transitions,” “concreteness”), but his rationale for this discourse agreed with mainstream poetics, the romantic valorization of the poet’s “voice.” Obviously, Arrowsmith’s translations can do little to question the shadow of neglect that Montale continues to cast on Italian experimentalists like Milo De Angelis.

2 Translating with resistancy

The irony of my situation was not lost on me. In pursuing my friend’s notion of simpatico, I discovered an Italian writer who forced me to suspect this notion and ultimately abandon it. When I came across De Angelis’s 1975 anthology selection and then got hold of his first book, what struck me most was the fact that on every level – linguistic, formal, thematic – his poems issue a decisive challenge to a poet-centered aesthetic. Their abrupt line-breaks and syntactical peculiarities, their obscure mixture of abstraction, metaphor, and dialogue give them an opacity that undermines any sense of a coherent speaking voice. They do not invite the reader’s vicarious participation and in fact frustrate any reading that would treat them as the controlled expression of an authorial personality or intention. Whose – or what – voice would speak in a translation of De Angelis’s poetry? Often, I should add, it is more of a question of which voice, since the snippets of dialogue that punctuate his texts are impossible to pin down to a distinct identity. De Angelis’s poetry questions whether the translator can be (or should be thought of as being) in sympathy with the foreign author. It rather shows that voice in translation is irreducibly strange, never quite recognizable as the poet’s or the translator’s, never quite able to shake off its foreignness to the reader.

As I began to translate De Angelis’s poems, I became aware that the notion of simpatico actually mystifies what happens in the translation process. Most crucially, it conceals the fact that, in order to produce the effect of transparency in a translated text, in order to give the reader the sense that the text is a window onto the author, translators must manipulate what often seems to be a very resistant material, that is, the language into which they are translating, in most cases the language they learned first, their mother tongue, but now also their own. Transparency occurs only when the translation reads fluently, when there are no awkward phrasings, unidiomatic constructions or confused meanings, when clear syntactical connections and consistent pronouns create intelligibility for the reader. When the translation is a poem in free verse, varied rhythms that avoid jogtrot meters are needed to give the language a conversational quality, to make it sound natural. Line-breaks should not distort the syntax so much as to hinder the reader’s search for comprehension; they should rather support the syntactical continuity that gets him or her to read for meaning over the lines, pursuing the development of a coherent speaking voice, tracing its psychological contours. These formal techniques reveal that transparency is an illusionistic effect: it depends on the translator's work with language, but it hides this work, even the very presence of language, by suggesting that the author can be seen in the translation, that in it the author speaks in his or her own voice. If the illusion of transparency is strong enough, it may well produce a truth-effect, wherein the authorial voice becomes authoritative, heard as speaking what is true, right, obvious. Translating De Angelis's poems demystified this illusionism for me because they so obviously resist fluency, cultivating instead an aesthetic of discontinuity.

Consider a poem entitled "L'idea centrale," a programmatic text which gave its title to De Angelis's anthology selection and appeared in Somiglianze:

È venuta in mente (ma per caso, per l'odore di alcool e le bende) questo darsi da fare premuroso nonostante.
E ancora, davanti a tutti, si sceglieva tra le azioni e il loro senso.
Ma per caso.
Esseri dispotici regalavano il centro distrattamente, con una radiografia, e in sogno padroni minacciosi sibilanti:
"se ti togliamo ciò che non è tuo non ti rimane niente."

(De Angelis 1976: 97)

The Central Idea

came to mind (but by chance, because of the scent of alcohol and the bandages) this careful busying of oneself notwithstanding.
And still, in front of everybody, there was choosing between the actions and their meaning.
But by chance.
Despotic beings made a gift of the center absentmindedly, with an x-ray, and in a dream threatening bosses hissing:
"if we take from you what isn't yours

The Italian poem offers glimpses of a hospital setting, ominous with its suggestion of injury and death, but the actual incident is never precisely defined, and the quasi-philosophical reflections on its meaning remain abstruse, only to be further obscured by the sudden shift to dreaming and the disturbing quotation. Not only can the reader not be sure what is happening, he also doesn't quite know who is experiencing it. Until the peremptory statement from the "padroni" ("bosses"), the tone is natural yet impersonal, ruminative but not actually introspective, lacking any suggestion that the voice belongs to a particular person, let alone someone who had himself experienced the mysterious physical danger. The text does not offer a coherent position from which to understand it or a psychologically consistent voice with which to identify. On the contrary, the fragmented syntax and abrupt line-breaks constantly disrupt the signifying process, forcing the reader to revise his interpretations. The opening lines are remarkable for their syntactical shifts and contortions, which compel some synthesis of the details just to make sense of them, but then weaken any closure with the qualification introduced by "nonostante" ("notwithstanding"). Enjambment is contradictory, schizoid, metamorphic. If "il centro" is given "distrattamente," in what sense can it be described as central? The "padroni" who are "minacciosi" ("threatening") turn "sibilanti," an Italian word often used to describe the sound of wind in the reeds, or snakes. The result of the discontinuous form of the poem is that it fails to create the illusionistic effect of authorial presence, demonstrating, with degrees of discomfort that vary from reader to reader, how much transparency depends on language, on formal elements like linear syntax and univocal meaning.

Most interestingly, De Angelis's abandonment of the formal techniques used to achieve transparency occurs in a poem whose representation of human consciousness clearly rejects romantic individualism. This is the concept of subjectivity that underlies such key affirmations of transparency as Wordsworth's theory of authorial expression in the preface to Lyrical Ballads (1800): "all good poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings" (Wordsworth 1974: 123). The same concept is also evident in Eliot's romantic modernism, his ultimate capitulation to the romantic cult of the author: "[poetry] is not the expression of personality," wrote Eliot at the end of "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919), "but an escape from personality. But, of course, only those who have personality and emotions know what it means to want to escape from these things" (Eliot 1950: 10–11). De Angelis's poem, in contrast, represents consciousness, not as the unified origin of meaning, knowledge, and action, freely expressing itself in language, but rather as split and determined by its changing conditions – waking and dreaming, thought and sensory impulses, meaning and action, medical diagnoses and chance. Thus, whatever the central idea may be, it doesn't come to mind through the subject's own volition; it arises only accidentally, through various determining factors over which the subject has limited or no control, like a smell, or the possibility of death.

Because this is a foreign text that refuses the romantic aesthetic of transparency which has long dominated British and American poetry, it makes any pursuit of simpatico difficult if not impossible for the English-language translator. “L’idea centrale” is not a congenial poem to bring into a culture that prizes individuality and self-determination to such an extent that intentionality and self-expression decisively shape its reflections on language and poetry. The continued dominance of these individualistic assumptions in contemporary British and American cultures inevitably makes De Angelis a minor writer in English, marginal in relation to the major English-language aesthetic, the transparent expression of authorial experience. Indeed, the dominance of individualistic assumptions makes translation itself a minor genre of writing in English, marginal in relation to writing that not only implements the major aesthetic of transparency, but bears the authorial imprimatur. Because transparent discourse is perceived as mirroring the author, it values the foreign text as original, authentic, true and devalues the translated text as derivative, simulacral, false, forcing on translation the project of effacing its second-order status with a fluent strategy. It is here that a Platonic metaphysics emerges from beneath romantic individualism to construe translation as the copy of a copy, dictating a translation strategy in which the effect of transparency masks the mediations between and within copy and original, eclipsing the translator’s labor with an illusion of authorial presence, reproducing the cultural marginality and economic exploitation which translation suffers today.³ I was definitely attracted by the difference of De Angelis’s poetry, even if it upset the Anglophone translation practices that my friend had described so lyrically. Yet this difference was forcing me to set new goals for my work. What could I hope to achieve by translating De Angelis into English? What theory would inform my translation strategy and govern my choices?

Certainly, I could defer to the prevailing cult of the author and make my translation of “L’idea centrale” as fluent as possible, perhaps with the vain hope of edging the poem closer to transparency. Some progress in this direction can be achieved if in line 12 of the translation the verb “were” is inserted before “hissing,” minimizing the fragmented syntax and giving more definition to the meaning, or if the verb “came” in the first line were given a subject, even one as vaguely defined as “it.” Of course, adding “were” and “it” would not go very far towards making the text transparent, but they would at least mitigate the grammatical uneasiness usually provoked by the omission of a subject or verb in an English sentence.

My English version, however, refuses fluency. Taking its cue from De Angelis’s own aesthetic, my strategy can be called resistancy: it seeks to reproduce the discontinuity of De Angelis’s poem. And the translation is no doubt more discontinuous with the omission of a subject and a verb. Resistancy was also at work in my effort to heighten the abruptness of the line-breaks, their effect of forcing the reader to change expectations. In line 1 “scent,” so vaguely defined that it can entertain the possibility of pleasantness, replaced two earlier choices, “smell” and “odor,” both of which carry strong negative connotations and so gave too much of a foretaste of the ominous “alcohol,” reducing the latter’s power to evoke surprise and fear. The line-break allows “scent” to release its various possible meanings, making its juxtaposition with “alcohol” a bit more jolting. Similarly, an earlier version of line 9 began with “carelessly,” but this was ultimately replaced by the more resonant “absentmindedly,” which seems not only inexplicable in the context of “gift,” but rather alarming: since the gift carries the important cognitive associations of “center,” it offers the reader the promise of intelligibility, of some light shed on the title – which, however, the idea of absentmindedness quickly betrays.

By adopting a strategy of resistancy to translate De Angelis’s poem, I have been unfaithful to, and have in fact challenged, the dominant aesthetic in the receiving situation, that is, British and American cultures, becoming a nomad in my own language, a runaway from the mother tongue. At the same time, however, implementing this strategy must not be viewed as making the translation more literal or more faithful to the foreign-language text. Although resistancy can be said to rest on the same basic assumptions about language and subjectivity that inform De Angelis’s poetry, my English version still deviates from the Italian text in decisive ways that force a radical rethinking of fidelity in translation. The kind of fidelity that comes into play here has been called “abusive” by Philip Lewis: the translator whose “aim is to recreate analogically the abuse that occurs in the original text” winds up both “forcing the linguistic and conceptual system of which [the translation] is a dependent” and “directing a critical thrust back toward the text that it translates” (Lewis 1985: 43). The “abuses” of De Angelis’s writing are precisely its points of discontinuity and indeterminacy. They continue to exert their force in Italian culture, on the Italian-language reader, long after the first publication of his poems. In 1983, for instance, the poet Maurizio Cucchi began his dictionary entry on De Angelis by stating that “pensiero e libertà dell’immagine spesso coesistono nei suoi versi, rivelando una sottesa, insinuante inquietudine, un attraversamento sempre arduo e perturbante dell’esperienza”/ “idea and freedom of image often coexist in his verses, revealing a subtending, insinuating uneasiness, an always arduous and troubling skewing of experience” (Cucchi 1983: 116). My strategy of resistancy aims to reproduce this effect in English by resorting to analogous techniques of fragmentation and proliferation of meaning. As a consequence, the translation establishes an abusive fidelity to the Italian text: on the one hand, the translation resists the transparent aesthetic of British and American cultures which would try to domesticate De Angelis’s difficult writing by demanding a fluent strategy; on the other hand, the translation simultaneously creates a resistance in relation to De Angelis’s text, qualifying its meaning with additions and subtractions which constitute a “critical thrust” towards it.

For example, certain features of the syntax in my translation make it stranger than De Angelis’s Italian. His first line gives a verb with no subject – “È venuta” – which is grammatically acceptable and intelligible in Italian because this particular tense indicates the gender of the subject, here feminine, almost immediately leading the Italian-language reader to the last feminine noun, which happens to be in the title, “L’idea.” English sentences without subjects are grammatically incorrect and often unintelligible. By following the Italian closely and omitting the subject, therefore, I was actually moving away from the foreign text, or at least making it more difficult, more peculiar: “È venuta” seems fluent to the Italian-language reader, the upper-case “e” showing that it begins a sentence, whereas the grammatical violation in “came to mind” (with the lower case) makes it seem unidiomatic or resistant to an English-language reader – even if this is only an initial effect, which eventually forces a glance back towards the title for meaning. My translation takes a syntactical subtlety in the Italian version, the absence of any explicit subject, and distorts it, giving exaggerated emphasis to what is only gently hinted in the Italian: that the central idea always remains outside of the poem because it is never explicitly stated, perhaps because it cannot be, because it questions any form of representation, whether in language, or X-rays.

In this instance, my translation exceeds the foreign text because of irreducible differences between the foreign and translating languages, syntactical differences which complicate the effort to produce resistancy. But the excess in the translation can also be seen in the fact that I rendered certain lines primarily on the basis of an interpretation of the poem. Because interpretation and poem are distinct entities, determined by different factors, serving different functions, leading different discursive lives, my interpretive translation should be seen as a transformation of the poem, grounded, it is true, on information about De Angelis’s readings in literature, literary criticism, and philosophy, but aimed at circulating this body of writing in Anglophone cultures where it continues to be alien and marginal. For what De Angelis’s poem shows British and American readers, with all the discomfort of the unintelligible, is that European culture has decisively moved beyond romanticism, in both its nineteenth- and twentieth-century manifestations.

In his letters to me, as well as in his essays, translations and interviews, De Angelis has made clear that his poetry assimilates various literary materials (European and Eastern, classical and twentieth-century), but also that it has a distinct philosophical genealogy: he has read widely in phenomenology and psychoanalysis, yet revises them according to the new conceptions of language and subjectivity that underlie the varieties of poststructuralist thinking in contemporary French and Italian cultures. An early interest in Maurice Blanchot’s critical speculations about the creative process and the nature of textuality led De Angelis to the study of Heidegger and Ludwig Binswanger, and finally to a belief in the importance of Nietzsche and Lacan for any contemporary project in poetry. This aspect of De Angelis’s writing was partly noted by Franco Fortini in a review of that first anthology selection: De Angelis, Fortini found, is “fascinated with the Heideggerian vortices of origin, absence, recurrence, and the danger of death” (Fortini 1975: 1309). My interpretation of “L’idea centrale” argues that it reflects Heidegger’s concept of “being-towards-death,” but that De Angelis submits this concept to a Nietzschean revision.

In Being and Time (1927), Heidegger argues that human existence is perpetually “falling,” always already determined by concerned relations with people and things, its identity dispersed into the “they” – until the possibility of death appears (Heidegger 1962: 219–24). The anticipation of death, the possibility of being nothing, constitutes a “limit-situation,” in which the subject is forced to recognize the inauthenticity of its determinate nature and gains “a freedom which has been released from the illusions of the ‘they,’ and which is factual, certain of itself, and anxious” (ibid.: 311). De Angelis’s “L’idea centrale” exploits the potential for drama in this climactic moment of truth by sketching a hospital scene. His poem depicts being-towards-death as a state of physical and psychological extremity where the apparent unity of lived experience is split by competing representations, and consciousness loses its self-possession and self-consistency. “Actions” are decentered from intentionality: “their meaning” is never uniquely appropriate to the subject, but an appropriation of the subject by the “they,” figured here as the “bosses” who are so “threatening” to identity because they speak “in a dream,” having even colonized the unconscious. The “central idea” is that subjectivity is ultimately “nothing,” mere action on which meaning is imposed, an ensemble of biological processes whose meaninglessness “despotic beings” inadvertently reveal when they attempt to master it and impose meaning through a scientific representation like X-rays. The formal peculiarities of this text – the shifts from realistic detail to abstract reflection to quoted statement, the scanty amount of information, the fragmented syntax – mimic the identity-shattering experience of being-towards-death by destabilizing the signifying process, abandoning any linearity of meaning, and unbalancing the reader’s search for intelligibility.

What does become clear, however, is that De Angelis’s disturbingly engimatic poem carries no suggestion that being-towards-death is the prelude to authentic existence, De Angelis resists Heidegger’s idea of authenticity as being which is unified and free, which is “something of its own” and can “‘choose’ itself and win itself” (Heidegger 1962: 68). In form and theme, “L’idea centrale” rather suggests Nietzsche’s corrosive notes in The Will to Power, where human agency is described as “no subject but an action, a positing, creative, no ‘causes and effects’” (Nietzsche 1967: 331).⁴ For Nietzsche, subjectivity can never be authentic, because it can never possess an essential identity: it is always a site of multiple determinations, whether produced by the grammaticality of language, the need for a subject in a sentence, or constructed by some more elaborate conceptual system or social institution, like a psychology, morality, religion, family, or job – the “bosses.” De Angelis’s poem calls attention to the contradictory conditions of subjectivity, which often remain unacknowledged in the “careful busying” of everyday life and need a limit-situation in order to reemerge in consciousness.

This interpretation allowed me to solve certain translation problems even as it created others. In line 3, for example, the Italian word “premuroso” can be translated variously as “thoughtful,” or “attentive,” or “solicitous.” I chose to avoid these more ordinary meanings in favor of “careful,” an equally ordinary word that has nonetheless supported a philosophical significance in English and can bring the text closer to what I take to be its themes: Heidegger’s English translators use “care” to render “Sorge,” the German word with which he characterizes the nature of everyday life (Heidegger 1962: 237). Similarly, in line 5, the Italian verb “si sceglieva” is ordinarily an impersonal form which does not require that a subject be specified. English sentences must have subjects, and so “si sceglieva” is often translated into English as “one chose,” or the passive voice is used. Yet since my reading establishes a connection with Nietzsche’s concept of human agency as subjectless action, as will or force, neither a subject nor the passive would do: I resorted to the slightly strange circumlocution, “there was choosing,” and avoided any explicit subject, even in as impersonal a form as “one,” while retaining a sense of forceful action. In both of these examples, the translation lost some of the ordinariness that makes the language of the foreign text especially moving and rich in possibilities – just as the use of “bosses” to translate “padroni” excluded the latter’s patriarchal associations, weakening the psychoanalytic resonance of the Italian.

My interpretation undoubtedly reflects some of De Angelis’s reading and thinking, but the translation solutions which it rationalizes do not make my English version any more faithful to its meaning. No, the interpretation has fixed a meaning, enabling the translation both to go beyond and fall short of De Angelis’s poem. Interestingly, the interpretation also points to a logical tension in the theme, namely the contradiction of Heideggerian authenticity by Nietzschean action. My interpretive translation in effect opens up this contradiction in the poem, foregrounds it, and perhaps reveals an aspect of De Angelis’s thinking of which he himself was not conscious or which, at any rate, remains unresolved in “L’idea centrale.” My interpretive translation exceeds the foreign-language text, supplementing it with research that indicates its contradictory origins and thereby puts into question its status as the original, the perfect and self-consistent expression of authorial meaning of which the translation is always the copy, ultimately imperfect in its failure to capture that self-consistency. The fact is that the original can be seen as imperfect, fissured by conflicting ideas, by the philosophical materials it puts to work, and the translation has made this conflict clearer.

This interrogative pressure in the translation surfaces in another point of resistance, an ambiguity entirely absent from De Angelis’s poem. Line 10, “and in a dream threatening bosses,” adheres to the word order of the Italian text as closely as linguistic differences permit. But because “threatening” is syntactically ambiguous, applying to either “dream” (as a participle) or “bosses” (as an adjective), the line releases a supplementary meaning which proves especially resonant in the interpretive context that guided my other choices: the “bosses” can also be seen as “threatened” by the nightmarish “dream” of determinate subjectivity, or more generally the agents that direct social institutions are equally determined by the hierarchical relations in which they dominate other agents. The “dream” becomes one of subversion by the dominated, and it is the dreamer who is “threatening” and “hissing” at the “bosses.” Here the abusiveness of the translation enacts an unsettling critique of the Italian text by exposing its privileging of the “bosses,” its implicit representation of power and social dominance as transcending the determinations of human action.

A strategy of resistancy thus results in an abusive fidelity which constructs a simultaneous relationship of reproduction and supplementarity between the translation and the foreign text. The precise nature of this relationship cannot be calculated before the translation process is begun because different relationships must be worked out for the specific cultural materials of different foreign texts and for the specific cultural situations in which those texts are translated. This makes translation labor-intensive, but also serendipitous, with the translator poring over dictionaries, developing many alternative renderings, unexpectedly finding words and phrases that at once imitate and exceed the foreign text. “In the work of translation,” Lewis notes, the integration that is achieved escapes, in a vital way, from reflection and emerges in an experimental order, an order of discovery, where success is a function not only of the immense paraphrastic and paronomastic capacities of language, but also of trial and error, of chance. The translation will be essayistic, in the strong sense of the word.

(Lewis 1985: 45)

Abusive fidelity can be achieved by various strategies of resistancy worked by various formal techniques, but more often than not the techniques surface accidentally as possibilities are tested, their effects evaluated only after the fact, when rationalization occurs.

The abuses in De Angelis’s “Il corridoio del treno” (“The Train Corridor”), also from Somiglianze, offer another illustration:

“Ancora questo plagio di somigliarsi, vuoi questo?” nel treno gelido che attraversa le risaie e separa tutto “vuoi questo, pensi che questo sia amore?” È buoi ormai
e il corridoio deserto si allunga mentre i gomiti, appoggiati al finestrino “tu sei ancora lì, ma è il tempo di cambiare attese” e passa una stazione, nella nebbia, le sue case opache.
“Ma quale plagio? Se io credo a qualcosa, poi sarà vero anche per te più vero del tuo mondo, lo confuto sempre” un fremere
sotto il paltò, il corpo segue una forza che vince, appoggia a sé la parola “qualcosa, ascolta, qualcosa può cominciare.”

(De Angelis 1976: 36)

“Again this plagiary of resemblance – do you want this?” in the cold train that crosses the rice fields and separates everything “you want this – you think this is love?” It is dark now and the deserted corridor lengthens while the elbows, leaning on the compartment window “you’re still there, but it’s time to change expectations” and a station passes, in the fog, its opaque houses.

 “But what plagiary? If I believe in something, then it will be true for you too, truer than your world, I confute it always”
 a trembling
 beneath the overcoat, the body follows a force that conquers, leans the word against itself “something, listen, something can begin.”

(De Angelis 1995: 55)

The fragmentation of subjectivity in the Italian text is its strongest and most striking point of resistance. The voice (or voices?) is apparently engaged in a strange lover’s quarrel, both bitter and very abstract, where desire is structured by conflicting modes of representation, but ultimately breaks them down. Although never defined as a distinct identity, with a definite age or gender, the quarrelsome voice at the opening sets up an opposition between two concepts of “love”: the first, judged false or inauthentic (“plagio”), is governed by “somigliarsi” (literally “resembling each other”), by an identity or sameness between the lovers; the second, implicitly favored by the voice, is an alternative governed by difference, or deviation, the invention of new “expectations” (“attese”). Yet the Italian text is already undermining this second alternative with “attese,” which can also mean “delays,” an ambiguity that submits the hopefulness of “expectations” to jaundiced skepticism. In fact, the quotation that begins “tu sei ancora lì” (“you’re still there”) can easily signify the introduction of a different voice, suggesting that maybe the one who hurled the accusation of “plagio” should be changing its expectations, that maybe the accuser should be abandoning any search for authentic existence, any effort to avoid the dishonesty of imitation, because desire always has contradictory determinations, frustrations, “delays.”

The insistent questioning proceeds to the Nietzschean argument that love is yet another form of the will to power, where two lovers are locked in a struggle for dominance and each can disprove (“confuto”) the other’s representation of their relationship, imposing a “world” that “will be true” for both. At this point, the voices lose what vague definition they may have acquired as the text unfolded, and the two conflicting positions of intelligibility are finally abandoned by the last voice, which implicitly calls for silence, full of expectation for another, still unspoken “word” that will construct a new subject-position for “the body,” a new representation for the biological “force” that threatens the linguistic basis of every relationship. The indeterminacy of the phrase “appoggia a sé la parola” (“leans the word against itself”) points to the contradictory interaction between language and desire. If “itself” is read as the “force” (or “body”? – another indeterminacy, perhaps less consequential here because of the connection between “force” and “body”), the “word” receives support from, or “leans [...] against,” the “force” as the meaning of a linguistic sign depends on the linkage between signifier and signified. Thus desire is seen as driving language use, but also as depending on such use for its articulation. Yet if “itself” is read as “the word,” in the sense of language in general, the “force” also “leans the word against” another word, circulating a chain of signifiers which defer the signified, throwing it into internal division. Here it is possible to glimpse Lacan’s fundamental idea that desire is simultaneously communicated and repressed by language (Lacan 1977).

The resistency of the translation reproduces the formal discontinuity of De Angelis’s poem by adhering to its line-breaks and syntactical peculiarities. A fluent strategy could easily iron out the syntax, for example, by correcting or completing the sentence fragments – in line 7 with the substitution of the verb “lean” for the participle “leaning”; in line 10 with the insertion of a verb phrase like “go by” after the fragmentary “opaque houses.” The translation, however, reproduces De Angelis’s challenge to transparent discourse by using broken constructions which have the effect of throwing the reading process off-balance, aggravating the already difficult problem posed by the shifting positions of intelligibility, the dislocation of voice.

It is in the quotations that the translation is most abusive of the foreign text. To mimic the drama of this situation, I sought to make the opening forcefully colloquial, inserting the abrupt dashes and fracturing the questions in line 4 by omitting the auxiliary “do.” Yet since my reading construes this text as a poststructuralist meditation on the relationship between language and desire, I sought to increase the philosophical abstraction of the English: “resemblance” replaced the more ordinary, and more concrete, phrase “resembling each other,” which is actually closer to the Italian “somigliarsi.” The mixture of colloquial and philosophical discourses in the translation reproduces but somewhat exaggerates the similarly discordant materials of the Italian text, its combination of concrete and abstract diction.

The resistant strategy is also evident in a tendency towards archaism in the translation, specifically the dated quality of “plagiary” and “confute” in place of the more contemporary usages, “plagiarism” and “refute.” These archaic words make the quotations more unusual and distancing to the English-language reader, drawing attention to themselves as words and thus abusing the canon of transparency. The word “plagiary” is particularly useful in producing this effect: it introduces a point of polysemy which opens up a metacritical register vis-à-vis the foreign text. The Italian “plagio” signifies the action or instance of literary theft, the practice of stealing a text or the stolen text, and would ordinarily be translated into English by “plagiarism”; the Italian for the agent, “plagiarist,” is “plagiario.” My choice of “plagiary” condenses these words and meanings: it can signify either “plagiarism” or “plagiarist,” the action or the agent, the text or the subject (OED). Combined with “resemblance” in the translation, “plagiary” becomes a pun which in itself brands any relationship based on identity as a crime against personal autonomy and individuality, a Heideggerian inauthenticity, a person-theft, conjuring up its Latin root plagiarius – kidnapper. But since “resemblance” also defines a mode of representation exemplified by transparent discourse, the pun on “plagiary” interrogates the subjective illusionism in transparency, its fiction of personal presence, its person-lie. The English lines, “plagiary / of resemblance,” at once valorize and demystify the concept of authenticity, locating within the strident voice at the opening a different, alien voice. The strain of archaism in the translation, finally, temporalizes De Angelis’s poem, suggesting that cultural forms governed by “resemblance” are situated in the past, static, unwilling to admit difference and change, but also that De Angelis’s concept of the subject as determinate process departs from the individualistic evocations of older, romantic and modern poetry. The archaism in the English version goes beyond the foreign text by adding a metacommentary on its form and theme.

3 In the margin of Anglophone poetics

Resistancy is thus a translation strategy by which De Angelis’s poems become strange to the Italian poet, as well as to the British and American reader and translator. It is certain that De Angelis will not recognize his own voice in the translations, not only because his ideas and texts would seem to make such a way of reading unthinkable for him, but also because he is unable to negotiate the translating language. Although he works with many languages, including Greek, Latin, French, German, and different dialects of Italian, he finds English difficult to master and can read my translations only with informants, usually native Italians who have studied English. When he does this collaborative reading, moreover, he sometimes discovers what I have been arguing, that my English loses features of the Italian texts and adds others which he had never anticipated.

The resistant strategy of my translations gives them a different, and perhaps more intense, strangeness in Anglophone cultures. They have enjoyed varying success with readers since the late 1970s. Most of them appeared in literary magazines, appealing to editors whose aesthetics normally diverge, both mainstream and experimentalist – although my translations have also been rejected by as many magazines.⁵ The complete manuscript, a selection from De Angelis’s poetry and critical prose, received many rejections from American and British publishers, including two university presses with noted translation series – Wesleyan and P (for “prestigious”: the editor at this press would not permit me to identify it). The anonymous readers’ reports for these presses, written in 1987, show quite clearly that my resistant strategy was strange because it abused the transparent discourse that dominates British and American poetry translation.

A reader for Wesleyan acknowledged the “difficulty” of De Angelis’s Italian texts, but felt that

Mr. Venuti’s translation makes matters more difficult by being faithful to this difficulty; he has chosen not to choose among the many ambiguous levels of meaning of [De Angelis’s] dense verse. For example, a calcio d’angolo remains a “corner kick,” no more and no less, and, as we see clearly from its placement in the poetic line, no compromise is made for the sake of the sound in English.⁶

The sort of fidelity Wesleyan’s reader preferred was evidently to the canon of transparency, which here includes univocal meaning and smooth prosody. But my translations aimed to register the linguistic and cultural differences of the Italian texts, their characteristic discontinuity, the neologisms, syntactical shifts, staccato rhythms. The reader’s example was taken from De Angelis’s poem “Antela,” whose experimentalist gestures begin in the title: a neologism combining “antenari” (“forebears”) and “ragnatela” (“spider web”). My version is entitled “Foreweb.” The abruptness of this poem, the dizzying succession of cryptic images, would demand considerable rewriting to produce fluent English verse. It would be easier, as Wesleyan evidently decided, to reject the entire manuscript.

C’è un crimine
 non so se commesso o visto in un tempo senza stile, come un’aria di blu e di buio, che mosse la destra. O qualcuno che, morso dalla cane, urla.
 Allora anche la mosca di pezza dà voli indiscussi e anche un ginocchio ferito nel calcio d’angolo ricuce il maschio con la femmina.

(De Angelis 1985: 46)

There is a crime
 I don’t know whether committed or witnessed in a styleless time, like a breeze blue and darkling, which moved the right hand. Or someone who, bitten by caries, screams.
 Then even the dust mote makes unquestionable flights and even a knee hurt in the corner kick stitches male back to female.

(De Angelis 1995: 105)

P's anonymous reader likewise expected an assimilation of De Angelis's experimentalism to transparent discourse. The reader's comments on specific translations revealed an insistence on immediate intelligibility, criticizing archaism and polysemy in favor of current English usage. My use of the word "plagiarism" in "The Train Corridor," for example, was called "really obsolete and obscure." This reader, like the one for Wesleyan, also recommended revising the Italian text, even when it contained a recognizable rhetorical device: "the discontinuity (anacoluthon) between lines 2 and 3 seems excessive, however justified by the original; a little glue seems needed."

My translations signify the foreignness of De Angelis's poetry by resisting the dominant British and American literary values that would domesticate the Italian texts, make them reassuringly familiar, easy to read. And this is the reception that the translations continued to get. A selection was included in a 1991 anthology, New Italian Poets, a project that was initially developed by the Poetry Society of America and the Centro Internazionale Poesia della Metamorfosi in Italy and later edited by Dana Gioia and Michael Palma (1991). The anthology received a few, generally favorable reviews in American, British, and Italian periodicals. In Poetry Review, however, poet and translator Jamie McKendrick reflected on the cultural differences between British and Italian poetry and singled out (my translations of) De Angelis as an example of these differences at their most alienating:

One feature that clearly distinguishes many of these poets from their British contemporaries is a freewheeling associative imagery which doesn't feel obligated to explain itself – sudden transitions, lacunae – or to situate itself in a familiar time and place. This is at its most irksome in Milo De Angelis, whom Palma, introducing him, suggests the reader should approach "with openness and sensitivity." If this is accomplished, the reader will be "moved by feelings and insights that, however ineffable, are genuine and profound." I did my best, but was left unmoved.

(McKendrick 1991: 59)

English-language readers will tend to be both "unmoved" and "irked" by De Angelis's poetry, not only because the extreme discontinuity of the texts prevents the evocation of a coherent speaking voice, but also because he draws on philosophical concepts that remain foreign, even antipathetic, to most British and American literary cultures. In a polemical essay published in 1967, Kenneth Rexroth wondered, "Why is American Poetry Culturally Deprived?" because he "never met an American poet who was familiar with Jean Paul Sartre's attempts at philosophy, much less with the gnarled discourse of Scheler or Heidegger" (Rexroth 1985: 59). Rexroth's point, that with few exceptions philosophical thinking is alien to twentieth-century American poetry, applies to most British poetry as well and remains true forty years later. Among the notable exceptions are the diverse group of "L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E" writers, such as Charles Bernstein, who has eroded the generic distinction between poetry and essay by drawing on various European traditions and thinkers, including Dada and Surrealism, Brecht and the Frankfurt School, poststructuralism and postanalytical philosophy (1986 and 1992). Since Bernstein's experimental writing – discontinuous, opaque, anti-individualistic – has long occupied a marginal position in American publishing, banished to the relative obscurity of the small press and the little magazine, and only recently has come to be published by university presses as well, still far from trade publishers of poetry, it demonstrates that contemporary American culture is not likely to give a warm reception to a poet like De Angelis, who writes with a knowledge of the main currents in Continental philosophy (Biggs 1990).

It is only fitting, then, that in 1989 my manuscript of his work, Finite Intuition, was accepted for publication by Los Angeles-based Sun & Moon, a small press whose list is devoted to experimentalists like Bernstein and whose financial problems prevented my translation from seeing print until 1995. Issued in a printing of 1500 copies, the book went out of print in 2007. A second selection of De Angelis's poetry translated by a different hand appeared in 2003 with an even smaller press, Chelsea Editions, in a printing of 1000 copies. The publisher, Alfredo de Palchi, has reported that sales have been negligible. De Angelis in fact enjoys a considerably more central position in Italian culture: his writing is published by both small and larger presses and is reviewed by noted critics in a wide range of newspapers and magazines, both local and national, little and mass-audience.⁷ Perhaps the clearest sign of his canonical status in Italy is that his first book, Somiglianze, was reissued in a revised edition in 1990.

If my translations of De Angelis's speculative poetry will not be immediately recognizable to the English-language reader, it is also true that I do not recognize my own voice in these translations. On the contrary, my encounter with De Angelis's texts has been profoundly estranging, and for reasons specific to my situation as a translator in contemporary Anglophone cultures: by making simpatico an impossible goal, the formal discontinuity of the Italian has forced me to question fluency, the dominant translation strategy in English, exposing its link to the individualism of romantic and modern theories of transparent discourse, dislodging me from the position constructed for the English-language translator by his manifold relations with editors, publishers, reviewers, and, as my friend's advice suggests, other translators. This estrangement can happen because the positioning by which a discursive practice qualifies agents for cultural production does not operate in an entirely coherent manner: a specific practice can never irrevocably fix identity, because identity is relational, the nodal point for a multiplicity of practices whose incompatibility or sheer antagonism creates the possibility for change (Laclau and Mouffe 1985: 105–14). A discursive practice like translation seems particularly vulnerable to shifts in positioning, displacements of identity: its function is to work on linguistic and cultural differences which can easily initiate an interrogation of the conditions of the translator's work. Thus, although the hegemony of transparent discourse in contemporary British and American cultures has made fluency the hegemonic strategy in English-language translation, De Angelis's poetry can still enlist the translator in a cultural contradiction: I was led to implement a resistant strategy in opposition to the discursive rules by which my work would most likely be judged, and yet that strategy, far from proving faithful to the Italian texts, in fact abused them by exploiting their potential for different and incompatible meanings.

The challenge which translating De Angelis's poetry poses to romantic and modern theories of discourse is quite similar to the one posed by Paul Celan's writing. In Celan's speech "The Meridian" (1960), the obscure discontinuity of his and other post-World War II European poetry – what he calls "the difficulties of vocabulary, the faster flow of syntax or a more awakened sense of ellipsis" – is associated with a rethinking of the lyric poem in its romantic and modern guises (Celan 1986: 48). Celan questions the lyric project of personal expression, of evoking an individual voice: the poem "speaks only in its own, its very behalf," he states, but it "has always hoped, for this very reason, to speak also on behalf of the strange [...] on behalf of the other, who knows, perhaps of an altogether other" (ibid.). The poem, then, does not express an authorial self, but rather liberates that self from its familiar boundaries, becoming "the place where the person was able to set himself free as an – estranged – I," but where "along with the I, estranged and free here, in this manner, some other thing is also set free" – free from the appropriating power of the speaking "I," of a personal language (ibid.: 46–7). The poem does not transcend but acknowledges the contradiction between self-expression and communication with some other, forcing an awareness of the limits as well as the possibilities of its language.

It is this sort of liberation that resistancy tries to produce in the translated text by resorting to techniques that make it strange and estranging in the receiving culture. Resistancy seeks to free the reader of the translation, as well as the translator, from the cultural constraints that ordinarily govern their reading and writing and threaten to overpower and domesticate the foreign text, annihilating its foreignness. Resistancy makes English-language translation a dissident cultural politics today, when fluent strategies and transparent discourse routinely perform that mystification of foreign texts. In the specific instance of Englishing De Angelis's poetry, the political intervention takes the form of a minor utilization of a major language. "Even when major," Deleuze and Guattari observe, "a language is open to an intensive utilization that makes it take flight along creative lines of escape which, no matter how slowly, no matter how cautiously, can now form an absolute deterritorialization" (Deleuze and Guattari 1986: 26).⁸ My translations of De Angelis's poetry obviously can never be completely free of English and the linguistic and cultural constraints which it imposes on poetry and translation; that line of escape would preempt any translation and is no more than a capitulation to the major language, a political defeat. The point is rather that my translations resist the hegemony of transparent discourse in English-language cultures, and they do this from within, by deterritorializing the translating language itself, questioning its major cultural status by using it as the vehicle for ideas and discursive techniques which remain minor in it, minoritizing the major language by opening it to the nonstandard forms that it excludes (cf. Venuti 1998: 9–13). The models for this translation strategy include the Czech Jew Kafka writing in German, particularly as Deleuze and Guattari read his texts, but also the Romanian Jew Celan, who took German on lines of escape by using it to speak of Nazi racism and Hebrew culture and by exploiting to an extreme its capacity for compound words and syntactical fragmentation (see e.g. Felstiner 1983, 1984). If the resistant strategy effectively produces an estranging translation, then the foreign text also enjoys a momentary liberation from the receiving culture, perhaps before it is reterritorialized with the reader's articulation of a voice – recognizable, transparent – or of some reading amenable to the dominant aesthetic in English. The liberating moment would occur when the reader of the resistant translation experiences, in the translating language, the cultural differences which separate that language and the foreign text.

Translation is a process that involves looking for similarities between languages and cultures – particularly similar messages and formal techniques – but it does this only because it is constantly confronting dissimilarities. It can never and should never aim to remove these dissimilarities entirely. A translated text should be the site where linguistic and cultural differences are somehow signalled, where a reader gets some sense of a cultural other, and resistancy, a translation strategy based on an aesthetic of discontinuity, can best signal those differences, that sense of otherness, by reminding the reader of the gains and losses in the translation process and the unbridgeable gaps between cultures. In contrast, the notion of simpatico, by placing a premium on transparency and demanding a narrowly conceived fluent strategy, can be viewed as a cultural narcissism: it seeks an identity, a self-recognition, and finds only the same culture in foreign writing, only the same self in the cultural other. For the translator becomes aware of his intimate sympathy with the foreign writer only when he recognizes his own voice in the foreign text. Unfortunately, the irreducible linguistic and cultural differences mean that this is always a misrecognition as well, yet fluency ensures that this point gets lost in the translating. Now more than ever, when transparency continues to dominate British and American cultures, ensuring that simpatico will remain a compelling goal for English-language translators, it seems important to reconsider what we do when we translate.

Chapter 7

Call to action

The translator is the secret master of the difference of languages, a difference he is not out to abolish, but rather one he puts to use as he brings violent or subtle changes to bear on his own language, thus awakening within it the presence of that which is at origin different in the original.

Maurice Blanchot (tr. Richard Sieburth)

In the brief but provocative essay “Translating” (1971), Blanchot inverts the conventional hierarchy wherein “the original” is superior to the translation. He considers the foreign text, not as the unchanging cultural monument in relation to which the translation must forever be an inadequate, ephemeral copy, but as a text in transit, “never stationary,” living out “the solemn drift and derivation [dérive] of literary works,” constituting a powerful self-difference which translation can release or capture in a unique way (Blanchot 1990: 84). This assumes the foreign text to be derivative, dependent on other, preexisting materials (a point made by Sieburth’s decision to render “dérive” as two words, “drift and derivation”), but also dependent on the translation:

a work is not ready for or worthy of translation unless it harbors this difference within itself in some available fashion, whether it be because it originally gestures toward some other language, or because it gathers within itself in some privileged manner those possibilities of being different from itself or foreign to itself which every living language possesses.

(Ibid.)

In negotiating the dérive of literary works, the translator is an agent of linguistic and cultural alienation: the one who establishes the monumentality of the foreign text, its worthiness of translation, but only by showing that it is not a monument, that it needs translation to locate and foreground the self-difference that decides its worthiness. Even “classical masterpieces,” writes Blanchot, “live only in translation” (ibid.). And in the process of (de)monumentalizing the foreign text, the translator precipitates equally “violent or subtle changes” in the translating language. Blanchot cites “Luther, Voss, Hölderlin, George, none of whom were afraid in their work as translators to break through the bounds of the German language in order to broaden its frontiers” (ibid.: 85).

The power of Blanchot’s suggestive observations can be released if we translate them yet again (after Sieburth’s translation and after the version presented in the foregoing commentary), situating them more locally, taking into account the material determinations of cultural practices. The difference that makes a source-language text valuable to Blanchot is never “available” in some unmediated form. It is always an interpretation made by the translator, not necessarily open to every reader, gaining visibility and privileged only from a particular perspective in the receiving culture, whether theoretical or critical, axiological or ideological. Every step in the translation process – from selecting a foreign text to implementing a translation strategy to editing, reviewing, and reading the translation – is mediated by the diverse values, beliefs, and representations that circulate in the translating language, always in some hierarchical order. The translator, who works with varying degrees of calculation, under continuous self-monitoring and with active consultation of cultural rules and resources (from dictionaries and grammars to translation strategies and other translations to original compositions, both canonical and marginal), may submit to or resist the forms, practices, and institutions that have accrued the greatest prestige and power in the translating language, with either course of action susceptible to ongoing redirection. Submission assumes an ethics of domestication at work in the translation process, locating the same in a cultural other, pursuing a cultural narcissism that is imperialistic abroad and conservative, even reactionary, in maintaining cultural hierarchies in the receiving situation. Resistance assumes an ethics of foreignization, locating the alien in a cultural other, pursuing cultural diversity, signalling linguistic and cultural differences and unsettling the hierarchies in the translating language. Resistance too can be imperialistic abroad, appropriating foreign texts to serve its own cultural political interests. But insofar as the resistance is directed against values that exclude or marginalize certain foreign texts, it performs an act of cultural restoration which aims to question and possibly re-form, or simply smash the idea of, canons in the receiving culture.

Blanchot is theorizing an approach to translation based on resistance, and as his examples and the occasion of his essay make plain (it is a commentary on Walter Benjamin’s “The Task of the Translator”), this approach is specific to the German cultural tradition. The theory and practice of English-language translation, in contrast, has been dominated by submission, by fluent domestication, at least since Dryden. Various alternative approaches have indeed existed, including Dr John Nott’s historicist opposition to bowdlerizing, Francis Newman’s populist archaism, and the polylingual experiments of Ezra Pound, Celia and Louis Zukofsky, and Paul Blackburn. Judging from their reception, however, these alternatives were frustrated by their own foreignizing tendencies: their strangeness provoked harsh criticism from reviewers, and they went unread or even – in Blackburn’s case – unpublished, relegated to the margins of British and American cultures, neglected by subsequent translators, translation theorists, and literary scholars. For the most part, English-language translators and their publishers have let their choice of foreign texts and their development of translation strategies conform to dominant cultural values in English. Foremost among these values has been a fluent discursive strategy that conforms to the current standard dialect and thereby produces an illusion of transparency – even if what actually constitutes a fluent translation has changed from one period to another as linguistic norms and stylistic canons have changed.

Nonetheless, alternative theories and practices of translation are worth recovering today because they offer translators exemplary modes of cultural resistance, however qualified they must be to serve a different and highly unfavorable scene. The domesticating translation that currently dominates British and American cultures, both elite and popular, can be challenged only by developing a practice that is not just more self-conscious, but more self-critical. Knowledge of the source-language culture, however expert, is insufficient to produce a translation that is both readable and resistant to a reductive domestication. Translators must also possess a commanding knowledge of the translating language and culture, past as well as present. And they must be able to deploy this knowledge in writing. The selection of a foreign text for translation and the invention of a discursive strategy to translate it should be grounded on a critical assessment of the receiving culture, its hierarchies and exclusions, its relations to foreign cultures worldwide. Before a foreign text is chosen or a translation commission is accepted, translators must scrutinize the current situation of the genre or text type, field or discipline in which they are working. Literary translators should be familiar with the canons of foreign literatures in English as well as the canons of British and American literatures, set against patterns of intercultural exchange and geopolitical relations (for a powerful example of this sort of cultural diagnosis, see Said 1990). Translators working in other disciplines of the human sciences should be familiar with the body of foreign texts that have achieved authority in British and American academic institutions as well as the Anglophone scholarship that is regarded as authoritative, similarly set in a global framework.

The ethnocentric violence of translation is inevitable: in the translation process, foreign languages, texts, and cultures always undergo some degree and form of exclusion, reduction, and inscription that reflect the cultural situation in the translating language. Yet the domesticating work on the foreign text can be a foreignizing intervention, pitched to question existing cultural hierarchies. I. U. Tarchetti's plagiarized translation of Mary Shelley's Gothic tale shows that a dissident translator can not only choose a foreign text that is marginal in the receiving culture, but translate it with a canonical discourse, developing a foreignizing fluency that produces the illusion of transparency and enables the translation to pass for an original composition, ultimately reforming the literary or scholarly canon in the translating language. Or a dissident translator can choose a foreign text that is canonical in the receiving culture, but translate it with a marginal discourse, reforming the canon of the foreign literature or scholarship that currently exists in translation by introducing a significantly different interpretation of the foreign text. Here Richard Pevear and Larissa Volokhonsky's work with Russian novelists like Dostoevsky has been illuminating: not only have they sought to adhere more closely to the Russian texts than previous English-language translators, but they have experimented with the prevailing form of fluency by varying the standard dialect with such nonstandard items as archaisms and colloquialisms.

No foreign text or discursive strategy is inherently foreignizing. Their value in a translation project is contingent on the cultural hierarchies in the receiving situation at a particular historical moment. For the translator, this value is primarily cast in linguistic terms, as a practice of writing in which verbal choices inscribe interpretations in the foreign text and create a cumulative ethical effect – although the history of translation presented in this book has shown that dissident translators may also command an extensive knowledge of the hierarchies that enable and constrain their work. For the scholar, the choices that comprise a translation must always be described, explained, and evaluated in relation to the cultural and social contexts in which that translation is produced and received. The contexts of production and reception may be riven with conflicts and contradictions that outstrip the translator's conscious control and complicate the ethical effect of the translation. Still, these contexts need to be reconstructed in a nuanced form because they are the key factors in any evaluation. What hangs in the balance is an understanding of the ethics of an intercultural relation and its potential cultural and social consequences.

Consider Richard Burton's remarkable version of the Arabian Nights (1885 and 1888). This translation is difficult to evaluate partly because of its contradictory ideological determinations. Edward Said shrewdly noted Burton's "two antagonistic roles": "Burton thought of himself both as a rebel against authority (hence his identification with the East as a place of freedom from Victorian moral authority) and as a potential agent of authority in the East" (Said 1978: 195). Thus Burton criticized Edward Lane's expurgated version of the Arabian Nights (1839) and presented his own translation as issuing a double challenge – to the hypocrisy of prevailing attitudes towards sexuality and to the limitations of current knowledge about the Arabic cultures under British control. In the foreword to his translation, Burton wrote that

In accordance with my purpose of reproducing the Nights, not virginibus puerisque [for young girls and boys], but in as perfect a picture as my powers permit, I have carefully sought out the English equivalent of every Arabic word, however low it may be or "shocking" to ears polite [. . .] with the aid of my annotations supplementing Lane's, the student will readily and pleasantly learn more of the Moslem's manners and customs, laws and religion than is known to the average Orientalist [. . .] England is ever forgetting that she is at present the greatest Mohammedan empire in the world.

(Burton 1885: I, xvi, xxiii)

By “Orientalist” Burton meant a scholar whose research specializes in Eastern languages and cultures. His translation, however, is a document of Orientalism in the additional, interdependent senses that Said conceptualized: “a style of thought based upon an ontological and epistemological distinction made between ‘the Orient’ and (most of the time) ‘the Occident’” and “a Western style for dominating, restructuring, and having authority over the Orient” (Said 1978: 2, 3). All three of these senses apply to Burton’s translation: it was based on the immense learning about the East that he acquired through study, research, and travel, it represented the East as aggressively and frankly sexual (among other stereotypical traits) in opposition to Western sexual practices, and it affiliated the knowledge of this representation with colonial domination. Yet the very discourse that was so questionable as an ideologically coded system of knowledge could prove to be subversive in a translation: Burton’s Orientalism was deployed in an effort to upset the hierarchy of moral values in Victorian Britain (Kennedy 2005: 232, 246–7). In this respect, especially when set against Lane’s domesticating version, Burton’s translation can be called foreignizing in intention.

This foreignizing intention is further complicated by another ideological contradiction. As Dane Kennedy has shown, Burton’s long and multi-faceted career as colonial officer and explorer, author and translator, involved an important change “from a philological to a physiological to a cultural conception of racial difference,” leading him to adopt a relativistic stance towards the foreign cultures he encountered (Kennedy 2005: 3). In his foreword to the Arabian Nights Burton urged his reader to adopt this stance in order to understand the sexual practices represented in the Arabic text as well as his decision to retain them in his translation:

we must remember that grossness and indecency, in fact les turpitudes, are matters of time and place; what is offensive in England is not so in Egypt; what scandalises us now would have been a tame joke tempore Elisæ. Withal The Nights will not be found in this matter coarser than many passages of Shakespeare, Sterne, and Swift, and their uncleanness rarely attains the perfection of Alcofribas Naiser [sic], “divin maitre et atroce cochon.”

(Burton 1885: I, xvi)

In the first sentence Burton argued for moral relativism: since sexual morality is culturally and historically specific, he suggested, his readers cannot condemn sexual references in either contemporary Egypt or the Elizabethan period (tempore Elisæ). Both cultures are fundamentally different from Victorian Britain. Yet in the second sentence, with the mention of several European authors (“Alcofribas Nasier,” an anagram of François Rabelais, is the pseudonym under which the French writer published Pantagruel in 1532), Burton’s argument abruptly shifted to universalism: the Arabian Nights cannot be condemned on moral grounds, he suggested, because in their sexual references they resemble the early modern literatures that Europeans value so highly. The relativist argument questioned not only Victorian morality but Christianity, generally any moral code or religious doctrine that would transcend time and place in its judgments. The universalist argument questioned Orientalism by erasing the distinction between Western and Eastern cultures.

Burton's arguments, regardless of their inconsistent logic, were clearly designed to upset Victorian cultural hierarchies. His allusion to English literature would be particularly subversive to the elite male readership he had pinpointed with his decision to publish his translation through private subscription (Kennedy 2005: 226). Burton was careful to select canonical English authors, and in observing a similarity between their works and the Arabian Nights he was in effect counteracting the ideological functions that English literature came to perform during the Victorian period. In a lecture delivered in 1848, for instance, the novelist Charles Kingsley made the increasingly familiar assertion that "the literature of every nation is its autobiography" and then proceeded to recommend the "extended study of English literature" for "the more national tone which it ought to give the thoughts of the rising generation" (Kingsley 1880: 130). In 1835, as a governing member of the East India Company, Thomas Babington Macaulay boasted that "the literature of England is now more valuable than that of classical antiquity" so as to justify the introduction of English studies into India as a means of strengthening British rule, thereby creating "a class of persons, Indian in blood and colour, but English in taste, in opinions, in morals, and in intellect" (Macaulay 1952: 726, 729; see Viswanathan 1989). After 1855, when the British Civil Service examination was revised to include English as well as classical literatures, curricula in English literary history were widely adopted at colleges and universities (Palmer 1967). In comparing the Arabian Nights to canonical English authors, Burton was not simply deflating the superiority that colonial officials like Macaulay attributed to Western cultures, especially England; he was also undermining the cultural basis for the formation of a British identity that was at once nationalist and imperialist.

Burton's foreignizing intention was complex, encompassing moral and literary values, and it informed the discursive strategies he developed in his translation. He rejected "the fluent and transparent styles of [the positivist historian Henry Thomas] Buckle and Darwin" because he found them inappropriate to literary genres, even though he admitted that such "styles" were instruments admirably fitted for their purpose: crystal-clear, they never divert even a bittock of the reader's brain from the all-important sense underlying the sound-symbols. But in works of imagination man wants a treatment totally different, a style which, by all or any means, little mattering what they be, can avoid the imminent deadly risk of languor and monotony and which adds to fluency the allurements of variety, of surprise and even of disappointment, when a musical discord is demanded.

(Burton 1888: VI, 411)

As a result, Burton cultivated a linguistic heterogeneity that preempted the illusion of transparency in order to recreate an important literary difference, a self-difference that he located in the Arabic text: “the classical and the popular styles,” he felt, “jostle each other in The Nights” (Burton 1885: I, xiv). Not only did he adhere closely to the Arabic, reproducing such features as the use of saj’ or rhyme schemes and resorting to alliteration where he could not reproduce the rhymes, but he also varied the current standard dialect of English with regional dialects, poetical archaisms, neologisms, and foreign loan words.

Most importantly, Burton’s archaisms were drawn from the history of English literature stretching from Anglo-Saxon to Middle English to Early Modern English. They included lexical items like “anon,” “avail,” “cark,” “cozened,” “naught,” “oft,” “rede,” “repine,” “rondure,” “sooth,” “verdurous,” “vouchsafe,” “whilome,” “wont,” and “yclept,” as well as grammatical and syntactical forms like “hadst” and “hath,” “thou,” “thy,” and “thine,” and inversions of standard word order, both subject-verb and adjective-noun. These features of English had appeared in Beowulf and the work of canonical authors like Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton, and Dryden, as well as nineteenth-century writers who had acquired cultural authority or fame, including Charlotte Brontë, Browning, Coleridge, William Gladstone, Keats, Scott, and Tennyson (OED). Some words and phrases had been used in other, widely read translations: John Florio’s version of Montaigne’s essays (1603) contained the phrase “cark [meaning “distress”] and care,” while Henry Francis Cary’s Dante (1814) included “verdurous.” And some of Burton’s syntax was recognizably poetic: his fondness for phrasing like “splendid stuffs and costly” and “a masterful potentate and a glorious” imitated a recurrent feature of Milton’s style, as in “th’upright heart and pure” from the opening of Paradise Lost (1667). For Burton’s educated readership, his translation reverberated through centuries of English literature, not only investing the Arabian Nights with an unprecedented cultural prestige but defamiliarizing English literary history by putting the language of canonical authors to unexpected uses.

The controversial reception of Burton’s translation makes clear that it produced a foreignizing effect. Inevitably Orientalism in all of its interdependent senses figured in the reviews: whether the translation was attacked for obscenity that was said to reflect the moral inferiority of Arab cultures or praised as an accurate representation of their uncivilized coarseness, the responses assumed the same fundamental difference between East and West that was complicit with British colonialism (Kennedy 2005: 228–30). Yet the ideological contradictions that emerged in Burton’s foreword, particularly his subversive use of Orientalism to criticize Victorian moral hypocrisy, also played into the reception. The distinguished cultural historian John Addington Symonds offered a forceful statement of this critique grounded on a universalist logic:

When we invite our youth to read an unexpurgated Bible (in Hebrew and Greek, or in the authorised version), an unexpurgated Aristophanes, an unexpurgated Juvenal, an unexpurgated Boccaccio, an unexpurgated Rabelais, an unexpurgated collection of Elizabethan dramatists, including Shakespeare, and an unexpurgated Plato (in Greek or in Prof. Jowett's English version), it is surely inconsistent to exclude the unexpurgated Arabian Nights, whether in the original or in any English version, from the studies of a nation who rule India and administer Egypt.

(Symonds 1885: 223)

On the score of sexuality, Symonds was insisting, Arabic literature actually bears a strong resemblance to the works that Western cultures have canonized.

In resisting the Victorian regime of fluency, furthermore, Burton foregrounded the "sound-symbols" of his verbal choices over their "sense," pointing to the second-order status of his translation and provoking comments from reviewers that ranged from knee-jerk dismissals to surprised appreciation. Although Symonds judged Burton's discursive strategies to be excessive ("Commanding a vast and miscellaneous vocabulary, he takes such pleasure in the use of it that sometimes he transgresses the unwritten laws of artistic harmony"), he nonetheless praised the translation as "executed with peculiar literary vigour" (Symonds 1885: 223). Other favorable reviewers were taken with Burton's poetical archaism, although they evaluated it differently. The Lincoln Gazette displayed an Orientalist superiority by commenting on "how pleasing is his use of antique phrase, serving as it often does to soften the crudity of Oriental expression" (Burton 1888: VI, 466). The Nottingham Journal, however, referred to Burton's versions of "the quatrains and couplets, reading like verses from Elizabethan mantels" (ibid.: 462). This sort of response showed that Burton's translation was capable of changing reading patterns, winning acceptance for the literature of a stigmatized foreign culture while casting English cultural history in a different light.

The various factors that complicated the production and reception of Burton's Arabian Nights made possible a foreignizing effect that was specific to its historical moment. The assertion that "rather than disrupting the feelings of moral complacency and cultural superiority of its readers, Burton's translation of the Arabian Nights actually validated these feelings" (Shamma 2005: 63) must be regarded as an oversimplification, based on a reductive reconstruction of Burton's cultural situation and his intention as well as the impact of his work. To generalize that "translations from Arabic, Persian or Sanskrit (cultures that the average nineteenth-century English reader generally considered inferior, or, at least, fundamentally dissimilar) could not have disrupted his or her entrenched beliefs" (ibid.: 65) ignores the fact that Burton's readers, far from "average," were primarily an educated elite capable of evaluating his translation. As Symonds's comment suggests (a comment that Burton reprinted in his appendix of reviews, but that is missing from Shamma's critical assessment), these readers shared or came to share his Orientalist critique of Victorian moral hypocrisy as well as his universalist challenge to Orientalism. Only a nuanced reconstruction of Burton's moment allows a precise distinction to be drawn between his Arabian Nights and a translation like Edward Fitzgerald's Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, as well as between Burton's particular openness to Eastern cultures and the cavalier attitudes expressed by Fitzgerald, who in an 1863 letter to the scholar Edward Cowell confided that "when I do look into Homer, Dante, and Virgil, Æschylus, Shakespeare etc., those Orientals look – silly!" (Fitzgerald 1901: II, 45). Burton's Arabian Nights, however contradictory its various determinations and effects, remains a stunning achievement that deserves the attention of translators working today as well as readers.

For foreignizing translation is beset with risks, especially for the English-language translator. Canons of accuracy are quite strict in contemporary British and American cultures, enforced by copyeditors and legally binding contracts. Standard contractual language requires that the translator maintain a close adherence to the foreign text:

The translation should be a faithful rendition of the work into English; it shall neither omit anything from the original text nor add anything to it other than such verbal changes as are necessary in translating into English.

(A Handbook for Literary Translators 1991: 16)

Because of the legal risk, the considerable freedom of Robert Graves or the editorial emendations of Pound are not likely to be adopted by many translators – at least not with foreign texts that haven't yet entered the public domain. Since "faithful rendition" is defined partly by the illusion of transparency, by the discursive effect of originality, the polylingualism of the Zukofskys and Blackburn is equally limited in effectiveness, likely to encounter opposition from publishers and large segments of Anglophone readers who read for immediate intelligibility. Nevertheless, contemporary translators can experiment with nonstandard linguistic forms as well as forms of intertextuality like allusion and quotation where they are appropriate to an interpretation of the foreign text. Fluency need not be abandoned, but rather reinvented so as to create new kinds of readability that provide more sophisticated pleasures by calling attention to the secondary status of the translation and by signalling the linguistic and cultural differences of the foreign text. Translators committed to changing their cultural marginality can do so only within the codes that are specific to the receiving culture. This means, on the one hand, limiting their discursive experiments to perceptible deviations that may risk but stop short of the parodic or the incomprehensible and, on the other hand, expanding their repertoire as writers to encompass a wide range of registers and dialects, styles and discourses drawn from the history and current state of literatures in English.

Translators must also force a revision of the codes – cultural, economic, legal – that marginalize and exploit them. They can work to revise the individualistic concept of authorship that has banished translation to the fringes of British and American cultures, not only by developing innovative translation practices in which their work becomes visible to readers, but also by presenting incisive rationales for these practices in prefaces and essays, lectures and interviews. Such self-presentations will indicate that the language of the translation originates with the translator in a decisive way, but also that the translator is not its sole origin: a translator's originality is second-order, revealed in the choice of a particular foreign text and in the development of a particular discursive strategy in response to an existing cultural situation (see Venuti 1998: chap. 2). Recognizing translation as a derivative form of authorship does not displace the foreign author, but rather questions the individualism of current concepts of authorial originality by suggesting that no writing can be mere self-expression because it is derived from a cultural tradition at a specific historical moment.

Yet most translators today don't wish to recognize the precise nature of their authorship or even to submit their practice to sustained theoretical or critical reflection. They are likely to feel that translation is basically a practical activity which requires little more than a knowledge of a foreign language and an elegant writing style, certainly not any immersion in translation studies or any familiarity with translation theory. In an essay called "Translating" (1988), Eliot Weinberger, the translator of such writers as Octavio Paz and Jorge Luis Borges, strings together a group of aphoristic statements in which he typically asserts that "translation theory, however beautiful, is useless for translating. There are laws of thermodynamics, and there is cooking" (Weinberger 1992: 60).

The aphoristic form Weinberger has chosen absolves him from devoting any attention to his topic, from building an argument in which he justifies a position that remains no more than implied. Still, he clearly does stake out a position. I take his statement first as an expression of his skepticism towards scientific laws for translation, a skepticism which I myself share. Even if neurological research progresses to the point of reducing the act of translation to brain functions, it remains a linguistic practice whose significance exceeds physiological processes to produce far-reaching cultural and social effects. This distinction, however, is far from the main drift of Weinberger's statement. His aim is rather to suggest that translation resembles cooking in that both can be done without theory, which is therefore "useless" to them.

Not only does this view seem mistaken about cooking, but it displays a certain naïveté about translation, and in both cases the problem lies in a basic misunderstanding of the nature and function of theory. Cooking requires ingredients, recipes, and techniques which are chosen, followed, and implemented on the basis of usually unstated assumptions of what constitutes a good meal. These assumptions may be personal preferences, matters of taste acquired over a lifetime of many meals with family and friends; they may be grounded on a broader and more comprehensive concept of physical health; they may encompass ideas about food cultures which are fashionable or politically inflected, connected to representations of different ethnic and national groups. I would describe these assumptions as constituting a theory insofar as they guide the choices and practices involved in cooking.

If translators are like cooks, then, their work is also informed by theoretical concepts that enable them to choose a foreign text as worthy of translation and to develop discursive strategies that they consider appropriate for translating it, regardless of whether these concepts are consciously or explicitly articulated before or during the translation process. A translator applies a theory, however inchoate, when one word or turn of phrase or sentence construction is selected over the alternative possibilities that always exist at any one point in a translation. To be sure, some translation theories may be too abstract or general to solve a specific lexical or syntactical problem: like any writer, the translator works at the sentence level, where verbal facility and sheer serendipity come decisively into play, where happening upon a viable solution seems pure chance but is really the result of education, experience, and memory. Nonetheless, a theory offers the conceptual parameters in which translation problems can be formulated with precision and a particular choice can be made with the help of reasons that take into account not just the foreign text and its culture, but also the receiving language and its culture. And only a carefully developed theory of translation can mediate with intellectual rigor and practical effectiveness between the translator's verbal choices and the institutional sites where the translation circulates and produces its cultural and social effects.

Weinberger's metaphors are misleading, but they exemplify the belletristic approach that contemporary translators take to their work. Translators tend to present themselves in the most impressionistic terms, making the empiricist assumption that the value of their writing is self-evident and ultimately advocating an understanding of translation that is not simply uncritical but anti-intellectual. When translators do take the time to write about their translations, they are likely to stress the relation between the translated and foreign texts and neglect the equally if not more important relation between the translated text and other texts written in the translating language (see e.g. Bassnett and Bush 2006). Without reflecting on this second relation, translators can all too easily make the naïve assumption that their interpretation of the foreign text is correct or right when in fact it is only one possibility among others. They will also overlook the impact of their work on readers, who come to translations today mainly because they cannot read the foreign texts. Without attending to readers, translators can't begin to think about the cultural and social effects of their translations or submit those effects to the sort of questioning that was so crucial for dissident translators in the past.

This questioning must also be directed to the language of contracts with publishers. Translators should insist on their authorial relation to the translated text during negotiations. They should demand contracts that define the translation as an "original work of authorship" instead of a "work-for-hire," that copyright the translation in the translator's name, and that offer standard financial terms for authors, namely an advance against royalties and a share of subsidiary rights sales. In the long run, it will be necessary to effect a more fundamental change, a revision of current copyright law that restricts the foreign author's control over the translation so as to acknowledge its relative autonomy from the foreign text. The foreign author's translation rights should be limited to a short period, after which the foreign text enters the public domain, although only for the purposes of translation (see Venuti 1998: chap. 3). Given the speed with which a book currently dates as a commodity on the international market, the prospect that translation rights will be sold grows less likely as time passes, and the translation of a foreign text ultimately depends on the efforts of a translator to interest a publisher, especially in British and American publishing, where so few editors read foreign languages. If, upon publication, a text is not an instant critical and commercial success in the culture for which it was written, the translation rights probably won't be sought by publishers in another culture. The project to translate it, therefore, should be controlled by the translator, who, in effect, must invent for readers of the translating language a foreign text that would otherwise be nonexistent to them.

A change in contemporary thinking about translation finally requires a change in the practice of reading, reviewing, and teaching translations. Because translation is a double writing, a rewriting of the foreign text according to values in the receiving culture, any translation requires a double reading – as both communication and interpretive inscription (see Venuti 2004). Reading a translation as a translation means not just processing its meaning but reflecting on its conditions – formal features like the dialects and registers, styles and discourses in which it is written, but also seemingly external factors like the cultural situation in which it is read but which had a decisive (even if unwitting) influence on the translator's choices. This reading is historicizing: it draws a distinction between the (foreign) past and the (receiving) present. Evaluating a translation as a translation means assessing it as an intervention into a present situation. Reviews must not be limited to rare comments on the style of a translation or its accuracy according to canons that are applied implicitly. Reviewers should consider the canons of accuracy that the translator has deployed in the work, judging the decision to translate and publish a foreign text in view of the current canon of that foreign literature in the translating culture. This also means that translators should be playing a much larger role in the reception of translations, reviewing them for periodicals and educating readers – both popular and professional – about the ways that a translated text might be read.

It is in academic institutions, most importantly, that different reading practices can be developed and applied to translations. Here a double reading is crucial. A translation yields information about the source-language text – its discursive structures and its themes – but no translation should ever be taught as a transparent representation of that text, even if this is the prevalent practice today. Any information derived from the translation is inevitably presented in terms of the translating language, which must be made the object of study, of classroom discussion and advanced research (see Venuti 1998: chap. 5). Research into translation can never be simply descriptive; merely to formulate translation as a topic in cultural history or criticism assumes an opposition to its marginal position in the current hierarchy of cultural practices. And the choice of a topic from a specific historical period will always bear on present cultural concerns. Yet even if research into translation cannot be viewed as descriptive, devoid of cultural and political interests, it should not aim to be simply prescriptive, approving or rejecting translation theories and practices without carefully examining their relationships to their own moments and to that of the researcher. Translators have an important role to play here too, as intellectuals whose traffic with the foreign can interrogate and change the academic status quo, but they need to be able to engage in current scholarly debates in the fields and disciplines in which they do their translating.

The translator's invisibility today raises such troubling questions about the geopolitical economy of culture that a greater suspicion towards translation is urgently needed to confront them. Yet the suspicion I am encouraging here assumes a utopian faith in the power of translation to make a difference, not only at home, in the emergence of new cultural forms, but also abroad, in the emergence of new cultural relations. To recognize the translator's invisibility is at once to critique the current situation and to hope for a future more hospitable to the differences that the translator must negotiate.

Notes

I Invisibility

- 1 These cultural and social developments have been described by various commentators. My sense of them is informed especially by Mandel 1975; McLuhan 1964; Horkheimer and Adorno 1972; Baudrillard 1983. Instrumental conceptions of language are of course not unique to the twentieth century; they date back to antiquity in the West and have influenced translation theories at least since Augustine (Robinson 1991: 50–4).
- 2 Holden 1991: chap. 1 offers a similar assessment of contemporary American poetry, although from a “centrist” position. For the historical development of transparent discourse in English-language poetry, see Easthope 1983.

- 4 The ambiguous legal status of translation is discussed by Derrida 1985a: 196–200; Simon 1989; Venuti 1998: chap. 3.
- 5 The UNESCO Recommendation on the Legal Protection of Translators and Translations and the Practical Means to Improve the Status of Translators (adopted by the General Conference at Nairobi, 22 Nov. 1976), follows the wording of the Berne Convention (article II.3): “Member states should accord to translators, in respect of their translations, the protection accorded to authors under the provisions of the international copyright conventions to which they are party and/or under their national laws, but without prejudice to the rights of the authors of the original works translated.”
- 6 This account of Blackburn’s Cortázar project draws on documents in the Paul Blackburn Collection, Archive for New Poetry, Mandeville Department of Special Collections, University of California, San Diego: Letter to John Dimoff, National Translation Center, University of Texas, Austin, 6 May 1965; Contract with Pantheon Books for the translation of End of the Game and Other Stories, 4 June 1965; Amendment to Contract with Pantheon Books, 12 May 1966; Letter to Claudio Campuzano, Inter-American Foundation for the Arts, 9 June 1966. Information concerning the “poverty level” is drawn from the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the pertinent years.
- 7 The 1969 translation rate is taken from the “manifesto” that concludes the proceedings from the landmark PEN conference held in 1970 (The World of Translation 1971: 377). The 1979 rate is taken from my own work-for-hire contract with Farrar, Straus & Giroux for the translation of Barbara Alberti’s novel Delirium, 29 May 1979.
- 8 For figures from 1950 to 1990, see the graph in the 1st edn of The Translator’s Invisibility (1995: 13). British statistics for that graph were drawn from Whitaker’s Almanack, American statistics from Publishers Weekly. I also consulted the data in the Index Translationum, among other UNESCO publications. Discrepancies among the translation statistics in these sources are due to various factors, notably different definitions of what constitutes a book and coverage of a limited range of foreign languages. The figures for American publishing in 1995 and 2004 are based on the annual publication Books in Print, which relies on ISBN numbers and therefore offers a more reliable account of book production. Whitaker Information Services is the source of the figures for British publishing in 2001.

- 9 Schleiermacher's theory, despite its stress on foreignizing translation, is complicated by the nationalist cultural program he wants German translation to serve: see Chap. 3, pp. 84–97.
- 10 For the impact of poststructuralism on translation theory and practice, see e.g. Graham 1985; Benjamin 1989; Niranjana 1992; Venuti 1992. Gentzler 1993: chap. 6 surveys this movement.
- 11 The same contradiction appears in Freud's own reflections on the therapeutic/hermeneutic dilemma of psychoanalysis in Beyond the Pleasure Principle (1920):

Twenty-five years of intense work have had as their result that the immediate aims of psychoanalytic technique are other today than they were at the outset. At first the analyzing physician could do no more than discover the unconscious material that was concealed from the patient, put it together, and, at the right moment, communicate it to him. Psychoanalysis was then first and foremost an art of interpreting. Since this did not solve the therapeutic problem, a further aim quickly came in view: to oblige the patient to confirm the analyst's construction from his own memory. In that endeavor the chief emphasis lay upon the patient's resistances: the art consisted now in uncovering these as quickly as possible, in pointing them out to the patient and in inducing him by human influence – this was where suggestion operating as “transference” played its part – to abandon his resistances.

(Freud 1961: 12)

Although Freud intends to draw a sharp distinction in the development of psychoanalysis between an early, hermeneutic phase and a later, therapeutic phase, his exposition really blurs the distinction: both phases require a primary emphasis on interpretation, whether of “unconscious material” or of “the patient's resistances,” which insofar as they require “uncovering” are likewise “unconscious”; in both “the analyst's construction” can be said to be “first and foremost.” What has changed is not so much “the immediate aims of psychoanalytic technique” as its theoretical apparatus: the intervening years witnessed the development of a new interpretive concept – the “transference.” Moreover, Freud's characterization of psychoanalysis as primarily therapeutic occurs in a late text that is one of his most theoretical and speculative. Bettelheim's conception of psychoanalysis, the basis for his rejection of the Standard Edition, smooths out the discontinuities in Freud's texts and project by resorting to a schema of development (like Freud himself):

The English translations cleave to an early stage of Freud's thought, in which he inclined toward science and medicine, and disregard the more mature Freud, whose orientation was humanistic, and who was concerned mostly with broadly conceived cultural and human problems and with matters of the soul.

(Bettelheim 1983: 32)

- 12 Although transparent discourse emerges in English-language translation most decisively during the seventeenth century, it has been a prevalent feature of Western translation theory and practice since antiquity. This topic is treated from various perspectives by Berman 1985; Renner 1989; Robinson 1991.

2 Canon

- 1 My conception of Denham and Wroth (discussed on pp. 36, 38 as “courtly amateurs” assumes Helgerson 1983.
- 2 For the cultural activities of exiled royalist writers, see Hardacre 1953. Steiner 1975: 13–25 considers the French influence on their translations. Zuber 1968 shows the importance of D’Ablancourt to the French translation tradition.
- 3 The Brute legend in English historiography is treated by Parsons 1929; Brinkley 1967; Jones 1944; MacDougall 1982. Bush 1962 offers a useful précis of the issues.
- 4 The historical allegory in Coopers Hill is elucidated by Wasserman 1959: chap. 3, esp. 72–6, and O’Hehir 1969: 227–56. For the ideological significance of Fanshawe’s and Wase’s translations, see Potter 1989: 52–3, 89–90; Patterson 1984: 172–6. Hager 1982 notes the domesticating impulse in Denham’s translation when discussing the Laocoön passage.
- 5 Ogilby’s version of these lines, in referring to the king’s “sacred body” and to the absence of “obsequies,” shares the royalism of Denham’s. For the politics of Ogilby’s Virgil, see Patterson 1987: 169–85.
- 6 This relies on Easthope’s account of transparent discourse in poetry and its rise during the early modern period (Easthope 1983: chap. 7).
- 7 Samuel Johnson admiringly discusses Denham in The Lives of the English Poets (1783), devoting an entire chapter to him but also commenting on his work in the chapter on Dryden.
- 8 Historical explanations of the heroic couplet that stress its political function are offered e.g. by Caudwell 1973: 99, 135; Korshin 1973; Easthope 1983: 119. John Milton may have set forth the first political reading of the heroic couplet when, in the prefatory statement to Paradise Lost (1667), he opposed the “ancient liberty” of blank verse to “the troublesome and modern bondage of Riming.”
- 9 For the emergence and function of the “public sphere” in the eighteenth century, see Habermas 1989; Hohendahl 1982; Eagleton 1984.
- 10 Alison describes the extremely favorable reception of Tytler’s treatise – “The different reviewers of the day, contended with each other in the earliness of their notice, and in the liberality of their praise” – concluding that “after the experience of fifteen years [and five editions], it may now be considered as one of the standard works of English criticism” (Alison 1818: 28).
- 11 For the ideological standpoint of the Edinburgh Review, see Clive 1957: chap. 4; Hayden 1969: 8–9, 19–22; Sullivan 1983b: 139–44.
- 12 Blackwood’s (1824) also ran a favorable review of the second volume of Rose’s Ariosto. For the ideological standpoint of this magazine, see Hayden 1969: 62–3, 73; Sullivan 1983b: 45–53.
- 13 For the ideological standpoints of these magazines, see Roper 1978: 174–6, 180–1; Hayden 1969: 44, 45, 73; Sullivan 1983a: 231–7 and 1983b: 57–62.
- 14 Quinlan notes that “the taste for Evangelical literature had eventually pervaded all ranks of society. Even among the upper classes there were many, like Lord Melbourne, who read theology and biblical criticism for pleasure” (Quinlan 1941: 271).
- 15 Lamb’s politics is also discussed by Dunckley 1890: 83–4, 106–7. Quinlan notes that “as compared with the strict Evangelicals who indiscriminately banned all novels and plays, the expurgators might consider themselves liberals, taking a middle course at a time when the most severe censors could not tolerate polite literature in any form” (Quinlan 1941: 229).

3 Nation

- 1 English renderings of Schleiermacher's lecture are taken from Lefevere 1977: 67–89, French renderings from “Des différentes méthodes du traduire,” tr. Berman 1985: 279–347. Quotations of the German follow Schleiermacher 1838: 207–45.
- 2 Sheehan 1989: 157–8 describes the different German cultural constituencies during this period.
- 3 For surveys of German nationalism in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, see Sheehan 1989: 371–88; Johnston 1989: 103–13.
- 4 Lefevere's choice of “the Germans translate every literary Tom, Dick, and Harry” to render Schlegel's “die Deutschen sind ja Allerweltsübersetzer” is typical of his strong reliance on fluent strategies that draw on contemporary English idioms.
- 5 For critiques of Schleiermacher's hermeneutics along these lines, see e.g. Palmer 1969: 91–4; Gadamer 1970: 68–84. Two expositions of Schleiermacher's hermeneutics which make clear but do not critique its individualism are Forstman 1968 and Szondi 1986.
- 6 I have avoided Lefevere's rendering of “alltäglich” as “colloquial” (Lefevere 1977: 227) because it misleadingly narrows the range of meanings for the German word. “Gemeinsprache” is usually translated as “colloquial” in English, whereas “alltäglich” has the force of such words as “familiar,” “common,” “ordinary,” “everyday.” Susan Bernofsky, in her recent version of Schleiermacher's lecture, chose “quotidian” (Schleiermacher 2004: 53).
- 7 Steiner 1974: 234 et passim was for many years the only translation theorist writing in English who recognized the importance of Schleiermacher's lecture – but for rather different reasons from those set forth here and in Berman 1984: 248–9n.
- 8 In this passage Lefevere is quoting Nida 1964: 159. Lefevere later reaffirmed his view of Schleiermacher's theory by asserting that “the second part of his famous maxim, ‘move the author towards the reader,’ [is] the only viable one” (1990: 19). Lefevere's later work showed a much greater concern for the cultural and social determinants of translation (Lefevere 1992a), although he felt that a foreignizing method like Schleiermacher's is obsolete because the audience for it has almost ceased to exist[,] the educated reader who was able to read original and translation side by side and, in doing so, to appreciate the difference in linguistic expression as expressing the difference between two language games.

(Lefevere 1992b: 5)

My argument, however, is that foreignizing translation can appeal to diverse cultural constituencies, monolingual as well as linguistically educated, but also that foreignizing translation discourses can be perceived without recourse to a comparison with the foreign text (even if such a comparison is certainly illuminating).

- 9 The account of Newman's career and opinions presented in the following paragraphs draws on the DNB, Sieveking 1909, and Newman's three-volume selection of his many lectures, pamphlets, and articles (Newman 1869, 1887, 1889).
- 10 For the diversity of the Victorian reading audience, see Altick 1957. For the meanings and uses of English archaisms, I have relied on the OED.
- 11 Newman referred to the “modern Greek Epic metre” in his 1851 review article, where he quoted from “a well-known patriotic address stimulating the Greeks to free themselves from Turkey” (Newman 1851: 390). His use of the “modern Greek Klephtic ballad” was noticed in the North American Review 1862a: 119. Hobsbawm discusses the role of the “klephts” in the Greek nationalist movement (Hobsbawm 1962: 173–4).

- 12 For liberal historiography, see Butterfield 1951; Burrow 1981; Culler 1985. Newman's other historical writings also reveal Whig assumptions. A liberal teleology shaped the lessons he drew from historical "contrasts" and frequently issued into a utopianism, both democratic and nationalistic:

We [...] can look back upon changes which cannot be traced in antiquity: we see the serf and vassal emancipated from his lord, the towns obtaining, first independence, next coordinate authority with the lords of the land. When the element which was weaker gradually works its way up, chiefly by moral influences and without any exasperation that can last long, there is every ground to hope a final union of feeling between Town and Country on the only stable basis, that of mutual justice. Then all England will be blended into one interest, that of the Nation, in which it will be morally impossible for the humblest classes to be forgotten.

(Newman 1847a: 23)

Newman treated capitalist economic practices with the same Whiggish optimism, asserting that because "all-reaching Commerce touches distant regions which are beyond the grasp of politics" geopolitical relations will eventually be characterized by "peace" (ibid.: 33).

- 13 The divided reception of the controversy becomes evident in a brief survey of the reviews. Arnold's recommendation of hexameters for Homeric translation was accepted in the North American Review 1862a and 1862b. More typical were reviews that accepted Arnold's academic reading of Homer, but rejected his recommendation of hexameters as too deviant from English literary tradition: see e.g. Spedding 1861 and the North British Review 1862. Near the end of the decade, Arnold's "brilliant contribution" to the controversy was still being mentioned in reviews of Homeric translations (Fraser's Magazine 1868: 518). Newman, in contrast, had few supporters. John Stuart Blackie seems to have been unique in agreeing with Newman's reading of Homer and recommending a rhymed ballad measure for Homeric translation (Blackie 1861).
- 14 Lattimore insisted that "my line can hardly be called English hexameter" because it lacks the regularity of nineteenth-century hexameters (he cited Longfellow). But he made clear the domestication at work in his version: he agreed with Arnold's reading of Homer and aimed to adapt his six-stress line to "the plain English of today" (Lattimore 1951: 55). The first paperback edn of Lattimore's Iliad appeared in 1961; by 1971 the translation had been reprinted twenty-one times.

4 Dissidence

- 1 My concept of foreignizing translation as a "dissident" cultural practice is indebted to Alan Sinfield's work on political forms of literary criticism, notably 1992. Especially pertinent to the politics of foreignizing translation is Sinfield's remark that "political awareness does not arise out of an essential, individual, self-consciousness of class, race, nation, gender, or sexual orientation; but from involvement in a milieu, a subculture" (1992: 37).
- 2 Williams 1958: chap. 2 has clarified this point. My argument concerning Tarchetti's cultural politics implicitly takes issue with Carsaniga:

In their loathing for everything bourgeois, the scapigliati found it necessary to break with the Manzonian tradition and its ideological mystifications; on the other hand their antisocial instincts prevented them from achieving an authentic realist art. [...] Tarchetti, who had been an acute observer and critic of the distorting disciplines of military life, took refuge in mysticism.

(Carsaniga 1974: 338)

Such comments tend to make the naive equation between realism and reality, failing to take into account the ideological determinations of literary form.

- 3 Costa and Vigni 1991 indicates that few book-length translations of foreign fantastic narratives were available in Italy before Tarchetti began writing and publishing: there were three editions of Hoffmann's tales (1833, 1835, 1855) and Storie incredibili (1863), which contained translations of Chamisso's Peter Schlemihls wundersame Geschichte and Poe's "The Murders in the Rue Morgue" and "The Oval Portrait." The Italian versions of Poe's texts were made from Baudelaire's French translations. Rossi 1959: 121–5 sketches the Italian reception of Poe.
- 4 From its very first issue, The Keepsake published Oriental tales and poems with titles like "Sadak the Wanderer. A Fragment," "The Persian Lovers," and "The Deev Alfakir" (Reynolds 1828: 117–19, 136–7, 160–9).
- 5 These clauses are taken from my contracts with American publishers for translations of several Italian-language books: Barbara Alberti, Delirium, Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 29 May 1979, p. 1; Restless Nights: Selected Stories of Dino Buzzati, North Point Press, 15 Sept. 1982, p. 2; and I. U. Tarchetti, Fantastic Tales, Mercury House, 3 July 1991, p. 5.

5 Margin

- 1 Pound expresses this sort of elitism in his introduction to Sonnets and Ballate of Guido Cavalcanti when he refers to "voi altri pochi [you other few] who understand" (Anderson 1983: 19). Other reviewers sympathetic to Pound's modernist translation projects include Murphy 1953; Ferlinghetti 1953; The New Yorker 1954.
- 2 Davie's commentary on Pound's writing includes two books, 1964 and 1976. Homberger discusses Davie's "sustained and occasionally bitter attack upon the intention behind the Cantos" (Homberger 1972: 28–9).
- 3 See also Stern 1953:

What is peculiar in Pound's translating shows up mostly in the famous versions of Cavalcanti and Arnaut Daniel. Away from the didactic context, Pound has tended to burden some of the translations with an antique weight (perhaps in order to carry what has since become staple or cliché or what has since vanished altogether from the tradition). [...] The finest English verse in The Translations comes in The Seafarer and in the Chinese poems of Cathay. There whatever is sporty or cagy or antique or labyrinthine in other sections of the book drops away and we have the pure, emotionally subtle, lovely verse which most English readers have Pound alone to thank for knowing.

Edwin Muir similarly praises "all the translations in the book except those from Guido Cavalcanti," adding, somewhat eccentrically, that "the poems from the Provençal and the Chinese bring off the miracle" (Muir 1953: 40).

- 4 Fitts's changing attitude towards Pound's writing is documented by the two reviews, the first a very enthusiastic assessment of A Draft of XXX Cantos from 1931, the second a curt dismissal of Guide to Kulchur from 1939 (Homberger 1972: 246–55, 335–6). Carpenter 1988: 507, 543 also notes Fitts's negative reviews of Pound. Pound, in turn, felt that even Fitts's positive reviews were misguided (Carpenter 1988: 478). Laughlin seems to have indulged Fitts's criticisms: he invited Fitts "to check and correct the classical allusions" in The Cantos (ibid.: 687).
- 5 The translation is reprinted, without the Latin texts, in Zukofsky 1991, where the dates of composition, 1958–69, are given in square brackets. Cid Corman, who was in correspondence with Louis Zukofsky and published some of the Catullus translation

- in his magazine Origin, notes that it involved “at least 8 or 9 years’ labor” (Corman 1970: 4). Celia Zukofsky later made clear the division of labor (Hatlen 1978: 539, n. 2). Pound’s influence on the Zukofskys’ Catullus can be inferred from Ahearn 1987: 200, 203, 208, 218.
- 6 I have learned much about the language of the Zukofskys’ Catullus from Guy Davenport’s brief but incisive essays, 1970 and 1979. See also Gordon 1979 and Mann 1986, who presents an astute discussion of the cultural and political issues raised by the translation.
 - 7 Not surprisingly, Raffel reviewed Apter’s study very favorably (Raffel 1985), and while his own study of Pound’s writing (Raffel 1984) includes a chapter on the translations, he entirely omits any discussion of the Cavalcanti and Daniel versions. See also Lefevere’s negative evaluation of the Zukofskys’ Catullus (Lefevere 1975: 19–26, 95–6). “The result,” Lefevere concluded, “is a hybrid creation of little use to the reader, testifying at best to the translator’s linguistic virtuosity and inventiveness” (ibid.: 26). Lefevere’s later work aimed to be “descriptive” instead of “prescriptive,” so he refrained from judging the Zukofskys’ Catullus, although pointing out that it has “never achieved more than a certain notoriety as a curiosum doomed not to be taken seriously” (Lefevere 1992a: 109).
 - 8 I cite the Blackburn–Pound correspondence from Paul Blackburn, Letters to Ezra Pound, Collection of American Literature, Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library, Yale University, and Ezra and Dorothy Pound, Letters to Paul Blackburn, Paul Blackburn Collection, Archive for New Poetry. Neither collection contains Blackburn’s first letters to Pound in 1950. Some of the correspondence is dated, either by the correspondents or by archivists; dates I have conjectured on the basis of internal evidence are indicated with a question mark. My reading of Blackburn’s relationship to Pound is indebted to Sedgwick 1985.

6 Simpatico

- 1 Montale’s Italian collections are Ossi di seppia (1925), Le occasioni (1939), La bufera e altro (1956), Satura (1971), Diario del ‘71 e del ‘72 (1973), Quaderno di quattro anni (1977), and Altri versi poesie disperse (1981), all of which were gathered in Montale 1984a. Another collection, Diario postumo, appeared in 1991 (2nd, enlarged edn, 1996).

- 2 The most comprehensive bibliography of twentieth-century Italian poetry in English is Healey 1998, to which I refer the reader for data on translations published before 1997. Later translations of the poets I mention are included in my bibliography. Only book-length English versions of Montale's work are listed in full.
- 3 These reflections on romantic individualism and its degrading of translation rely on Derrida 1976 and Deleuze 1990: 253–66.
- 4 See also On the Genealogy of Morals:

A quantum of force is equivalent to a quantum of drive, will, effect – more, it is nothing other than precisely this very driving, willing, effecting, and only owing to the seduction of language (and of the fundamental errors of reason that are petrified in it) which conceives and misconceives all effects as conditioned by something that causes effects, by a “subject,” can it appear otherwise.

(Nietzsche 1969: 45)

Deleuze 1983: 6–8 offers an incisive exposition of Nietzsche's “philosophy of the will.”

- 5 The magazines that published my translations of De Angelis's poetry include American Poetry Review, Paris Review, Poetry, and Sulfur. The translations were rejected by Antaeus, Conjunctions, Field, New American Writing, The New Yorker, and Pequod, among others.
- 6 Letter from Peter Potter, Assistant Editor, Wesleyan University Press, 24 Nov. 1987.
- 7 De Angelis's poetry has been reviewed in little magazines like Produzione e cultura, in the widely circulated literary tabloid Alfabeta (now defunct), and in mass-audience magazines like L'Espresso and Panorama. Newspapers that have printed reviews of his books include La Gazzetta di Parma, La Stampa, and Corriere della Sera.
- 8 Derrida similarly notes that “there are, in one linguistic system, perhaps several languages, or tongues. [...] There is impurity in every language,” and he concludes that “translation can do everything except mark this linguistic difference inscribed in the language, this difference of language systems inscribed in a single tongue” (1985b: 100). I am arguing that it is precisely this difference that the strategy of resistancy is designed to mark, the differences among languages, but also within them.

The Translation Studies Reader

Second edition

Edited by Lawrence Venuti

‘This is bound to be the most authoritative anthology of theoretical reflection on translation currently available in English. The selection of primary documents is varied and imaginative, the editorial introductions lucid and informed.’

Theo Hermans, University College London, UK

This new and fully revised edition of The Translation Studies Reader provides a definitive survey of the most important and influential approaches to translation theory and research, with an emphasis on the developments of the last thirty years. With introductory essays prefacing each section, the book places a wide range of seminal and innovative readings within their thematic, cultural and historical contexts.

Translation and Conflict

Mona Baker

‘This groundbreaking volume challenges commonly held views on translation agency. It is a brilliant exploration of translators’ narrative positionality that brings new and invaluable insights into the ethics of translation.’

Annie Brisset, University of Ottawa, Canada

Translation and Conflict demonstrates that translators and interpreters participate in circulating as well as resisting the narratives that create the intellectual and moral environment for violent conflict. Drawing on narrative theory and using numerous examples from historical and contemporary conflicts, the author provides an original and coherent model of analysis that pays equal attention to micro and macro aspects of the circulation of narratives in translation, to translation and interpreting, and to questions of dominance and resistance.

The study is particularly significant at this juncture of history, with the increased interest in the positioning of translators in politically sensitive contexts, the growing concern with translators’ and interpreters’ divided loyalties in settings such as Guantanamo, Iraq, Kosovo, and other arenas of conflict, and the emergence of several activist communities of translators and interpreters with highly politicized agendas of their own, including Babels, Translators for Peace, Tlaxcala and ECOS.

Including further reading suggestions at the end of each chapter, Translation and Conflict will be of interest to students on courses in translation, intercultural studies and sociology as well as the reader interested in the study of social and political movements.

Mona Baker is Professor of Translation Studies and Director of the Centre for Translation and Intercultural Studies, University of Manchester. She is author of In Other Words: A Coursebook on Translation, editor of The Routledge Encyclopedia of Translation Studies, Founding Editor of The Translator, and Vice President of the International Association for Translation and Intercultural Studies.

Translation and Globalization

By Michael Cronin

Translation and Globalization is essential reading for anyone with an interest in translation, or a concern for the future of our world's languages and cultures. This is a critical exploration of the ways in which radical changes to the world economy have affected contemporary translation.

The Internet, new technology, machine translation and the emergence of a worldwide, multi-million dollar translation industry have dramatically altered the complex relationship between translators, language and power. In this book, Michael Cronin looks at the changing geography of translation practice and offers new ways of understanding the role of the translator in globalized societies and economies.

Drawing on examples and case-studies from Europe, Africa, Asia, and the Americas, the author argues that translation is central to debates about language and cultural identity, and shows why consideration of the role of translation and translators is a necessary part of safeguarding and promoting linguistic and cultural diversity.
